Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is it not a fact that in the Southern States he will find university graduates, and in our own State men who are graduates from the very best schools not only in the United States but in Europe, who are now residents of the South, who are southern born and raised? I dissent from the gentleman's statement.

Mr. SLAYDEN. But the gentleman did not catch my statement. However, in reply to him I will state that I have personally known a great many very distinguished and honorable graduates of the greatest universities in the world who could not speak and write correct English and who certainly could not paint a great picture, chisel a worthy statue, or write a high-class book.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. I will ask the gentleman what he thinks of a given number of men, self-appointed, creating themselves through an act of Congress into a self-perpetuating body that shall determine who shall be entitled to recognition. The thing about this that I do not like is the fact that these gentlemen appoint themselves as the arbiters of all matters of science and art and determine who shall be worthy of future admission to this academy of immortals.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I do not personally know much about that. I do not recall anything at this moment about the academy in Germany, the academy in England, or in Spain. They have them in all of these countries. We have all read perhaps more about the French academy, and I think that academy selects its own members.

Mr. SHERLEY. And what we have read about the French academy is mostly of the distinguished men who have been denied admission to the French academy, men whom the world admitted to a real hall of fame, in spite of the action of the academy.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Oh, being men, no doubt they will make mistakes.

I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, when I first read the list of notables here enumerated in the proposed act I thought there was a good deal of sectionalism in the bill. But I notice that the very first name, the president of the association or incorporation we propose to incorporate, is W. D. Howells, who Ohio claims. I notice also that the chancellor, William M. Sloane, is an Ohio man, although they are both scheduled in the list as residents of other States. In looking over Who's Who in America I find there are 8 of these men who are really Ohio men, and I have just learned from the statement of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] that there are 11 of them who are from the Southern States. I notice some of them who are very well known in the world of achievement as coming from the South. Take, for instance, Mr. Brander Matthews. He is domiciled in New York, but a southern man. Then there is Mr. Gildersleeve, who was born, as I remember it, in South Carolina. Then there is President Woodrow Wilson listed as coming from New Jersey, when, as a matter of fact, he was born in Virginia. An analysis of the list shows the following facts against what has been termed a sectionalism in the bill: Sixteen come from New York, 13 from Massachusetts, 5 from Connecticut, 3 from Vermont, 2 from New Hampshire, 8 from Ohio, 4 from Indiana, 1 from Michigan, 8 from Pennsylvania, 2 from New Jersey, 11 from the Southern States, and 6 from foreign countries.

It is easy to understand why they are printed as coming from the East, and especially the great centers. These men who have distinguished themselves in various fields of art and letters are located in places where they can get together, where a community of interest is possible. They have gotten together, evidently, and have asked for this incorporation to give them the recognition and dignity that goes with the incorporation by the authority of the Nation. It does not mean that the number is to be limited to these who are asking to be incorporated whose names are in the proposed act, and therefore I think that that objection would not be valid.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN. Has the gentleman noticed that the bill does propose to limit the number of this association at any time to 50?

Mr. FESS. That is, of regular members. All associations of this kind have two classes of members—regular and associate. Sometimes they are classed as regular and honorary. Other associations classify under the heads active and associate members.

Mr. MARTIN. Is there any provision in the bill for any other kind of members?

Mr. FESS. I see no provision; but it would not prevent the election of associate members, just as in the American Historical Association or other similar associations.

Mr. MANN. The bill does provide for the election of honorary and associate members.

Mr. FESS. I thank the gentleman for calling my attention to that. I had not noticed it. Mr. Speaker, I sent over to the Library a moment ago for a list of similar associations incorporated by the authority of Congress. The list sent to me numbers 34. Since receiving it I went to the telephone to verify the statement that these have all been incorporated by act of Congress, and am told that they have been, and, if I desired it, the date of the act would be furnished. The list is as follows:

1. Academy of Natural Sciences, Philadelphia.
2. Academy of Science, St. Louis.
3. Academy of Science and Art of Pittsburgh.
4. Academy of Science and Letters, Sioux City.
5. American Academy of Dramatic Art.
6. American Academy of Political and Social Science.
7. American Forestry Association.
8. American Forestry Congress.
9. American Historical Association.
10. American Institute of Architects.
11. American Institute of Electrical Engineers.
12. American Institute of Mining Engineers.
13. American-Irish Historical Society.
14. American-Jewish Historical Society.
15. American Philological Association.
16. American Philosophical Association.
17. American Psychological Association.
18. American Society of Mechanical Engineers.
19. Archæological Institute of America.
20. Association of Engineering Societies.
21. Illuminating Engineering Society.
22. National Academy of Design.
23. National Academy of Sciences.
24. National Institute of Arts and Letters.
25. National Institute of Social Sciences.
26. Southern Historical Society.
27. Unitarian Historical Society, Boston.
28. California Academy of Sciences.
29. New York Academy of Sciences.
30. Academy of Natural Sciences of Philadelphia.
31. American Philosophical Society, held at Philadelphia, for Promoting Useful Knowledge.
32. Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching.
33. Carnegie Institution of Washington.
34. National Conservatory of Music.

I hope that there will be no serious objection to this national recognition of the effort toward the organization of an academy of arts and sciences. It is only another item in the great movement toward the better and higher appreciation of things that are worth while. The objection that it is undemocratic is without force. If denial is placed upon that ground, then all such organizations should be so opposed. I do not see any serious objection to this any more than to the American Historical Association or to the American Philosophical Association or any of the other 32 such associations already incorporated. Some of these associations are domiciled at Philadelphia, others in New York, others in Boston, others in Pittsburgh, and still others in Washington. They are all incorporated under the authority of national law. I sincerely hope objection will not be pressed, but this House will show its appreciation of this sort of achievement.

The following is a list of the officers and members of the American Academy of Arts and Letters:

[Revised to January, 1915.]

OFFICERS.

President, Mr. Howells; chancellor and treasurer, Mr. Sloane; permanent secretary, Mr. Johnson.

Directors, Messrs. Blashfield, Brownell, Hastings, Howells, Johnson, Mead, and Sloane.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, no bill in my memory which has sought to form a close corporation has embodied the idea that it was not subject to revision and repeal by the Congress. Here we provide by this bill—different from the House bill, which had the repealable clause—the authority that these gentlemen, estimable, holding high positions as they do, may constitute themselves a small, exclusive body to determine who shall be included within the class of immortals. I do not wish to dispute that these persons named have achieved high distinction in the realm of letters, painting, and the like, but a mere glance over the list shows that it is sectional in its character. I take issue with the author of this bill that there are not men from the South, men from the West, the Middle West, and the far West, who have achieved as much distinction in the line of letters as those men who are named here.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman is referring to me, I hope he will take the stenographer's notes and see that he is quoting me absolutely incorrectly.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not intend to quote the gentleman incorrectly, but I say that there are men in the South who have achieved as high distinction in the realm of letters—for instance, James Lane Allen——

Mr. SLAYDEN. I hope the gentleman——

Mr. STAFFORD. And other men who, by their records in art and literature, have achieved as high worth as these men, some of whom are on the verge of the grave and some of whom have already passed into the realm beyond.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I protest against the gentleman putting words in my mouth which I did not say.

Mr. STAFFORD. I did not refer to the gentleman in my second statement. The gentleman misunderstands me entirely.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman repeated it a second time.

Mr. STAFFORD. And I repeat it a third time.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And I desire to protest that I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not saying what the gentleman said, but I will repeat it a third time, that there are gentlemen as worthy of inclusion in this list from the South and West as those who are named. There are two fundamental objections. We are seeking to create by act of Congress a corporation with certain 50 named persons designated, and another provision limiting the number hereafter to 50. If there were no restrictions as to the number, the objection would not be so great, but here you create a small class of 50 selected dignitaries—you leave it to these men to say who shall be considered as a select class, the only worthy of the worthy. I do not think that is American. I have no objection to a corporation being formed which comprises all who are entitled to it nationally, but when it comes to enacting a law which creates a class which shall arrogate to itself the privilege of determining that they alone have the high characteristics to obtain membership to this select class I dissent because I know many who are equally as worthy as those who are included, even though they happen not to be domiciled in the sacred precincts of the commercial center of the country, not the literary center but the commercial center—New York.

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. STEENERSON. Does the gentleman think the United States Government ought to be represented on this board, that some of the officials, like the Commissioner of Education or some other officials, the President of the United States?

Mr. STAFFORD. That is worthy of consideration, except that might include many worthy people.

Mr. PLATT. The President of the United States is included.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is not officially. He is included by reason of his historical writings, essays, and very worthily so, on account of the position he has occupied in the realm of letters.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Does not the gentleman think after this association has been incorporated we can easily get up another one to take in all those very worthy men, and even ourselves, if necessary?

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman will permit, that goes to the main question. These gentlemen have a perfect right to associate themselves together and put the seal of their approval upon whom they please; but for them to come and ask the Congress to delegate to them the seal of authority to determine who are fit to be within an exclusive class of 50 immortals is to undertake something that comes mighty near the extreme of egotism and presumption, no matter what the ability of these gentlemen.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I must decline to yield further. We surrender to them for all time the right of Congress to repeal this act, never before, in my knowledge, done; and I challenge anyone to say where in any of these 36 similar incorporations of the past Congress did not reserve the right to repeal, and yet under this bill we surrender that privilege.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. How much time have I occupied?

The SPEAKER. Seven minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does the gentleman remember the instance of three tailors who got into a back room in a tailor shop in London and declared that those three were the people of London, and proceeded then to give directions to the British Empire?

Mr. STAFFORD. We do not have to go to London to find that. We find it here in this country. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SLOAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. SLOAN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if he has discovered any reason why Walt Mason, the most widely read, and the most generally read, and the best-paid poet on the Western Continent, a citizen of Nebraska, loaned temporarily to Kansas, is not mentioned in that list?

Mr. STAFFORD. You can keep on citing names ad infinitum of men illustrious in the realm of letters who are entitled as much to inclusion in this list as this select few.

I reserve the balance of my time. How much time have I used, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has used eight minutes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas has five minutes remaining.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Wisconsin to go on and use some more of his time.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am strongly opposed to this bill in its present form. I am under obligations to yield five minutes to a gentleman in favor of it, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], who controls the time for the opposition, yet generously yields to me, knowing I will support the bill.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is in substance an application made by a number of American citizens, distinguished in arts and letters, who desire to incorporate as a national association, having for its purpose the furtherance of the interests of literature and the fine arts in the United States. No one here will venture to question the entire worthiness of that purpose. No one but desires that literature and the fine arts may be encouraged, that their standards may be elevated; that their appreciation may be increased. If the Congress of the United States can by this mere recognition of the worthiness of their purpose aid these gentlemen in their endeavor to further these interests it ought to do so.

The American Academy of Arts and Letters as a voluntary association has been in existence some years. It will doubtless continue its existence whether we incorporate it or not. But it is desired that as this association is composed of men from all over the United States and is national in its scope, it be given national recognition, just as we have given national recognition to the American Academy of Political and Social Science, to the American Historical Association, to the National Academy of Sciences, and to some 30 other national associations of similar character.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I will.

Mr. SHERLEY. Why do they need a special act of Congress? They can incorporate under the laws of practically every State in the Union or under the laws of the District of Columbia?

Mr. TOWNER. I think that is a very pertinent inquiry, and I will say in reply that, so far as I am informed, it is only because they desire to add as much dignity and importance to the association as is possible.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, if the gentleman please, is it not the real reason that they hope by virtue of an act of Congress to have themselves designated as the exclusively chosen patrons of art and letters?

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman would reflect, I think he would not desire to asperse the character of those men by attributing to them any such selfish purpose.

Mr. SHERLEY. Oh, if the gentleman——

Mr. TOWNER. I decline to yield any further, Mr. Speaker, because I have not the time.

These men are representative of that which is best in American art and letters. They are incapable of such an unworthy desire as the gentleman ascribes to them. In so far as any selfish purpose is indicated, it is only that the association may become more efficient and influential in promoting art and letters in the United States. It is not intended that an exclusive cult shall be formed which shall determine standards or ideals. It is certainly proper to place a limit on the membership of an association of this kind. That is always done. But how unreasonable it is to charge that because a number of men and women desire to associate themselves for the furtherance of any worthy purpose, such an endeavor is an attempt to arrogate to themselves exclusive possession of merit or distinction in such field. Other associations may be formed. Individual effort is not in any way discredited or handicapped. In order to better accomplish a worthy purpose these gentlemen, who have won distinction in their several lines, who stand for that which is best and most elevated in American letters and art, desire to associate themselves into an organization that shall assist in advancing the cause and increasing the influence of letters and art. This is a worthy purpose. We should encourage rather than disparage it.

Mr. DIES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. For a question only.

Mr. DIES. I would like to ask the gentleman how many new stars have been added to the constellation since we killed the bill before?

Mr. TOWNER. I hardly know what the gentleman means. If he means that the selection of membership does not meet with his approval, I will say to the gentleman that any selection that could be made would be subject to criticism.

Mr. DIES. I want to know if there are any new names.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. TOWNER. The charge has been made before and is again urged that the bill is sectional; that in the names of the incorporators there are too many from the East and too few from the West and South. As I view it, that objection, if true in fact, should be given little weight. If a number of gentlemen in any worthy cause of this character desire to associate themselves and they are of enough distinction to compel national respect and approval, even if they were all from a single State or city, I would not consider that fact a sufficient reason why we should not recognize them.

But the sectional objection has little basis in fact. In giving the present location of the organizing members it appears that a large number are found in New York, Boston, and the East. But the chairman, Mr. Howells, is from Ohio, as is the chancellor and treasurer, Mr. Sloane. There are eight Ohio men in the association. There are 11 from the Southern States. Chase, the artist, and Riley, the poet, come from Indiana. Cable comes from Louisiana, Joel Chandler Harris from Georgia, and John Muir was a Californian. Woodrow Wilson is put down from New Jersey, but he was born in Virginia. Many men of arts and letters have gravitated to the eastern centers because they find in such centers the association, the market, and the material for their work. To urge this objection under the circumstances is an exhibition of narrow provincialism unworthy of the Members of this House.

It is not likely if we fail to incorporate the association it will be materially injured by such failure. The association can continue its work as a voluntary association without national official recognition. But we shall injure ourselves if we do not pass this bill. Our refusal to do so for reasons assigned today will not be creditable to us. We should be able, at least occasionally, to be broadminded, and to understand and appreciate some of the things that rise above neighborhood prejudices. It will be altogether creditable to the American Congress if it shall pass this bill. It will be a reflection upon our intelligence if we refuse to pass it.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I make a similar request. I want to print a letter from Robert Underwood Johnson.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Suppose everybody did that? Everyone has a letter from Mr. Johnson.

Mr. FERRIS. They have not had a good one, like this.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, the letter is from the Hon. Robert Underwood Johnson, formerly editor of the Century Magazine. He is a fluent writer and a distinguished citizen of the Republic. His letter has certain value to this question. It is pertinent and deserves a place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in connection with this bill. It is as follows:

THE CENTURY ASSOCIATION,
7 West Forty-third Street, February 12, 1915.

DEAR MR. FERRIS: If you were selecting the best chemists in the country, would you select them according to States or according to distinction?

As a matter of fact, the members of the American Academy of Arts and Letters since its organization is geographically well distributed if you take the birthplaces of the 79 members, living or dead. You see, writers and artists come to New York and Boston for their market and for the sympathy and comradeship found in large cities. I inclose a list. Will you not have the justice and kindness to show it to those who are affected by the geographical distribution of residences? No amount of residence in New York can obscure the fact that Mark Twain was a Missourian. So is Augustus Thomas. Howells, Sloane, Kenyon, Cox all came from Ohio; Cass Gilbert from Michigan; Chase, the artist, from Indiana, where I spent my boyhood, coming east to join the Century Magazine staff—a national organ. Riley lives in Indiana, where Moody was born; John Muir was a Californian; Joel Chandler Harris from Georgia; Prof. Gildersleeve, born in South Carolina, lived in Virginia, and now lives in Maryland; Cable and Matthews were born in Louisiana; Brush, whose paintings are in the Corcoran, was born in Tennessee; Van Dyke, Wister, and Furness, the great Shakespeare commentator, came from Pennsylvania.

Please ask Mr. SLAYDEN to let you see the full list.

Is it not a trivial objection that the academy, based on large achievement, has no representative of certain States where less attention is given to literature and the arts? So much more do they need the help of such an organization. With thanks for your frank letter and hope that you will help us with our enabling act on Monday, I am,

Very sincerely, yours,

R. U. JOHNSON.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY].

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to reflect upon any of the individuals named in this list. Some of them I happen to have the pleasure of knowing. All of them are men of distinction, and I in no way object to the bill because of the absence of the names of men residing in the South. I am not sectional in my opposition. I realize fully that art and science know no geographical limitations, and it is for that very reason that I deeply resent the egotism that I believe underlies this movement. It is not the first time in the history of the world when men distinguished in art and letters have, from what they thought very proper motive, or, as the gentleman from Iowa put it, a desire to elevate the world in art and letters, undertaken to arrogate to themselves the sole right of determining what shall be thought worth while in art and letters and who shall be worthy of the approval of these self-appointed censors. The world has grown too big for academies of 50 people to pass upon eligibility for fellowship in the society of intellectual endeavor and achievement, and there is nothing more distinctly un-American than for the National Congress to give its sanction to 50 self-appointed individuals, no matter how eminent they may be, with power to perpetuate themselves and their association and to put the ban of their disapproval or the smile of their approval upon all who may knock hereafter for recognition in art, in science, or in literature. And, as I said a moment ago to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN], a good many academies of the world, self-created, have become famous because of the men they refused admission to rather than on account of those that they admitted within their sacred portals. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] has five minutes left.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is recognized for three minutes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this bill is a companion piece to the law creating the National Institute of Arts and Letters that we passed some time ago. I believe the membership in that institute is 250, or something like that.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That is right.

Mr. MANN. This provides for the American Academy of Arts and Letters, with a membership of 50. Both of these institutions have been in operation for a number of years. The American Academy has been in existence for about 10 years. Men are elected members of the academy, which is the 50-membership institution, from the national institute, which is the 250-membership institution.

Of course, they will exist voluntarily, one of them now being already authorized by law, even if we do not authorize this one by law. There is no doubt in my mind that it is intended by the bill to give these gentlemen a distinction, possibly adding somewhat to the distinction which they would otherwise attain. Yet I can see no harm in it. If this proposal were simply to name these 49 gentlemen named in this bill to create an American academy as a new proposition, I would be opposed to it, because I note from an examination of the bill that out of the 49 members named, 21 come from the State of New York, 11 come from Massachusetts, 2 from the District of Columbia, 3 from Connecticut, 5 from New Jersey, 3 from New Hampshire, and 1 from Maryland, 1 from Indiana, 1 from California—and he is dead—and only 1 from Philadelphia and Pennsylvania combined. [Laughter.]

I would not have created the institute in this manner if it had been left to me to determine the organization. But as the institute is already in existence and men have been selected because of their prominence in arts and in letters, it seems to me that we can not criticize because these men happen to reside in the States named.

It is true that many of them came from other States to New York and Massachusetts. It is undoubtedly true also that many of them are named in this list because they have come in personal touch with the other men living in New York and Boston. And yet it is inevitable that a center grows up in reference to any line, either of thought or business, and the center of thought in the way of literature and art does actually exist in New York City and Boston, in the main; and those of us, if we should attain prominence in the arts or literature, would probably move to one of those cities, as every man in the country who endeavors to attain to prominence in statesmanship in the end desires or seeks Washington for a home a portion of the time, because this is the center of the country as to statesmanship. Therefore I can see no objection to the passage of the bill. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire if the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] intends to close in one speech?

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is my purpose to yield all of my time, except half a minute for one statement, to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. STAFFORD. It is only fair, then, to say that I hope the gentleman will use his minute, and I propose that we shall have only one more speech on this side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] is recognized.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Then I will act on the suggestion of the gentleman from Wisconsin. I have a letter here from a gentleman highly connected with the Government of the United States which, I think, should meet the approval of gentlemen from Minnesota. It is the President of the United States who is anxious for the passage of this bill.

It must be admitted, as stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], that the men most eminent in letters, in painting, sculpture, and in architecture are associated with this institution, and no reason has been advanced to show why it should not pass.

I yield the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker, to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, in all fairness to the gentleman, I will say that we have on this side but one speech remaining. The gentleman from Texas is entitled to close. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN].

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to give this bill my support, but as a Representative from a Southern State, I can not do it. I can not virtually say by my vote that the entire Southern States are without men who are qualified and that their names should not be associated with a great national project or proposition of this kind. I should consider it a reflection upon the South and an insult to my constituents to be compelled to vote for a bill of this kind, and I hope we shall send it back to the committee, and that the gentlemen mentioned in the bill will find out there is a great section of this country not only south of the Ohio River, but west of the Mississippi River. [Applause.]

During the Sixty-first Congress—a Republican Congress—in having the pictures of the previous Speakers of this House painted we found well-known southern artists to paint the pictures of Speakers who were elected from the Southern States; and in this matter I ask this Democratic House, made up practically of a majority of southern men, to vote with me, a southern Republican, against this bill, and send it back to the committee, and if those interested do not know that we have men of art and literary talent in the South and West, we will give them time to find out before they get a proposition of this kind through the House with the aid of our votes [Applause.]

BRIDGE ACROSS THE SUWANEE RIVER, FLA.

The SPEAKER. Before the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER], he desires to announce the cancellation of his signature to the bill (S. 7555) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Suwanee River, in the State of Florida.

AMERICAN ACADEMY OF ARTS AND LETTERS.

The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] for four and one-half minutes.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in favor of this bill. Gentlemen have given various reasons for opposing it. Some have said that its tendency is exclusive, aristocratic, sectional, and that it confers unwarranted special privileges. But it is no more exclusive, aristocratic, or sectional than are the 34 or 35 corporations that Congress already has created, nor does it confer any more unwarranted privileges. We already have the American Academy of Sciences; we already have the American Historical Society. This bill merely proposes to create a sister society to these to include in its membership painters, sculptors, musicians, and authors, and to be called the American Academy of Arts and Letters.

Gentlemen complain of the limited number of the incorporators. Of course their number is limited. Of necessity this must be so. But in this there is nothing either aristocratic or unduly exclusive. Congress incorporated the American Red Cross Society. Its original incorporators were limited in number. But at that time no one said, as gentlemen have said here to-day, "We must not incorporate the Red Cross Society, because if we do we thereby say that only those whose names are mentioned as incorporators shall be entitled to be considered charitable; we will support no bill of this kind unless its list of incorporators shall include the name of somebody from my congressional district or State." Mr. Speaker, with all respect for the gentlemen who have made that argument to-day, it is the narrowest possible sort of a way to consider a question of this kind. Wisconsin has nearly completed, at a cost of $6,000,000, a superb State capitol. Among the other great artists who have decorated the structure is Blashfield, of New York, one of the incorporators named in the pending bill. Who decorated the beautiful State capitol in Minnesota? Were they men from some congressional district in Minnesota or were they from the East? How preposterous to talk about art as though it were a matter of mere geography. Painting, sculpture, and music speak a universal language and make a universal appeal.

Mr. MARTIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. I have no time to yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. COOPER. One gentleman says, "Let us send this bill back until we can get into it the name of somebody from the South." Well, George W. Cable was born in Louisiana. His name is here. The name of Thomas Nelson Page, of Virginia, is here.

Mr. SLAYDEN. And the name of Joel Chandler Harris.

Mr. ESCH. Joel Chandler Harris.

Mr. COOPER. The name of Joel Chandler Harris is here. I am not going to vote against this bill because it makes no mention of anybody from Wisconsin.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] asks, "Have there been any distinguished reputations made since we killed the bill before?" Now, the fact that a bill has been killed before does not signify that it was not meritorious. The amendment for the income tax was killed by Congress more than once before it became a part of the Constitution. The constitutional amendment for the election of Senators by the people was killed time and again before at last it became a part of the Constitution. Consecutive defeats do not always demonstrate the unworthiness of the measure that is defeated. I can not understand the logic of the gentleman.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. COOPER. No; I have only very little time. I can not yield. The bill makes provision not only for regular members, but also for foreign, domestic, or honorary members. I regret that I have not time in which to discuss it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired. The question is on suspending the rules, discharging the Committee on the Library from the further consideration of the bill read at the desk, and passing the bill.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were—ayes 62, noes 41.

Accordingly, two-thirds not voting in the affirmative, the motion was rejected.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE IN THE PRODUCTS OF CHILD LABOR.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H. R. 12292) to prevent interstate commerce in the products of child labor, and for other purposes, as amended.

Mr. MANN. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether the motion is to pass the House substitute as it is printed?

Mr. PALMER. Yes; the amended bill as it is printed in the report.

Mr. MANN. As it is printed in bill form, as amended?

Mr. PALMER. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Of course, whatever is read from the desk is what will be voted upon.

The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it shall be unlawful for any producer, manufacturer, or dealer to ship or deliver for shipment in interstate commerce the products of any mine or quarry which have been produced, in whole or in part, by the labor of children under the age of 16 years, or the products of any mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment which have been produced, in whole or in part, by the labor of children under the age of 14 years, or by the labor of children between the age of 14 years and 16 years, who work more than eight hours in any one day, or more than six days in any week, or after the hour of 7 o'clock p. m. or before the hour of 7 o'clock a. m.

SEC. 2. That the Attorney General, the Secretary of Commerce, and the Secretary of Labor shall constitute a board to make and publish from time to time uniform rules and regulations for carrying out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 3. That for the purpose of securing proper enforcement of this act the Secretary of Labor, or any person duly authorized by him, shall have authority to enter and inspect at any time mines, quarries, mills, canneries, workshops, factories, and manufacturing establishments in which goods are produced for interstate commerce.

SEC. 4. That it shall be the duty of each district attorney to whom the Secretary of Labor shall report any violation of this act, or to whom any State factory or mining or quarry inspector, commissioner of labor, State medical inspector, or school-attendance officer, or any other person shall present satisfactory evidence of any such violation to cause appropriate proceedings to be commenced and prosecuted in the proper courts of the United States without delay for the enforcement of the penalties as in such cases herein provided.

SEC. 5. That any person, partnership, association, or corporation, or any agent or employee thereof manufacturing, producing, or dealing in the products of any mine, quarry, mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment who shall violate any of the provisions of section 1 of this act, or who shall refuse or obstruct the entry or inspection authorized by section 3 of this act, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished by a fine of not more than $1,000 nor less than $100, or by imprisonment for not more than one year nor less than one month, or by both fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court: Provided, That no dealer shall be subject to conviction under the provisions of this section who shall establish a guaranty issued by the person by whom such goods were manufactured or produced, and residing in the United States, to the effect that in the manufacture and production of such goods, neither in whole nor in part, had children been employed or permitted to work in any mine or quarry under the age of 16 years, or in any mill, cannery, workshop, factory, or manufacturing establishment under the age of 14 years, or between the ages of 14 years and 16 years, who worked more than eight hours in any one day, or more than six days in any week, or after the hour of 7 o'clock p. m. or before the hour of 7 o'clock a. m. Said guaranty, to afford the protection above provided, shall contain the name and address of the person giving the same, and in such event such person shall be amenable to any prosecution, fine, or penalty to which the person seeking the protection of such guaranty would otherwise have been subject under the provisions of this act. The word "dealer" as used in this act shall be construed to include any individual or corporation, or the members of any partnership or other unincorporated association.

SEC. 6. That in prosecutions under this act each shipment or delivery for shipment shall constitute a separate offense.

SEC. 7. That this act shall take effect from and after one year from the date of its passage.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. PALMER. I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina objects, and the Chair will appoint the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] as tellers.

The House divided, and the tellers reported that there were 54 ayes and 32 noes.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia makes the point that no quorum is present, and evidently there is not. The Doorkeeper will close the doors and the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. PALMER) there were—36 ayes and 64 noes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. TRIBBLE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia will state it.

Mr. TRIBBLE. When the call comes on the point of no quorum, will the vote be on an adjournment?

The SPEAKER. If there are enough Members rise to order the yeas and nays, the vote will be on the question to adjourn.

Mr. PALMER. If a sufficient number of Members do not arise to get the yeas and nays, will the vote be on the adjournment?

The SPEAKER. No; and if the yeas and nays are refused, the House will have refused to adjourn by a vote of 64 to 36. The question is on taking the vote by yeas and nays, and all those in favor of taking the vote by yeas and nays will rise. [After counting.] Twenty-eight Members; a sufficient number.

Mr. PALMER. The other side, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Those opposed to taking the vote by yeas and nays will rise. [After counting.] Sixty-five gentlemen have arisen. Twenty-eight is a sufficient number, and the Clerk will call the roll on the motion to adjourn.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 63, nays 201, not voting, 159, as follows:

Mr. WATSON with Mr. VARE.
Mr. WILLIAMS with Mr. WALLIN.
Mr. CAREW with Mr. WINSLOW.
Mr. MAHER with Mr. KIESS of Pennsylvania.
Mr. JONES with Mr. KRIEDER.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, on a second roll call before my name was reached I voted "nay," thinking the Clerk called by name. I may have been mistaken, owing to the great confusion in the Hall. It may have been that the Clerk called the name of Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina, which sounds very much like my own.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will inquire if Mr. GODWIN of North Carolina voted on this roll call, or if he is here. [After a pause.] Does any gentleman from North Carolina know whether Mr. GODWIN was in the room or not? [After a pause.] The Chair gets no response. There is no question but the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. GOODWIN] has voted.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Before the motion to adjourn was made a second was demanded and tellers were ordered on the question of ordering a second. Upon the announcement of the vote by tellers the yeas and nays were ordered on the point of no quorum being made. Does the vote now recur on ordering a second?

The SPEAKER. No. The motion is to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the roll call discloses the presence of a quorum.

Mr. PALMER. The only other question was the point of no quorum. That has been disposed of.

The SPEAKER. That is true. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, when the vote was taken by tellers the point of no quorum was made.

The SPEAKER. Not when taken by tellers.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. No quorum was present when the vote was taken by tellers.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not recall that anybody raised the point on the vote by tellers on ordering the second.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The point was raised, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that the point of no quorum was made on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. That motion was made. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE] made the point of no quorum when the announcement of the vote by tellers was made on ordering a second.

Mr. TRIBBLE. That is correct.

The SPEAKER. In any event a quorum is now present.

Mr. TRIBBLE. There was no quorum present when the vote was taken by tellers on ordering a second. I made the point of order that no quorum was present.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present now.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. The contention is that the vote on ordering a second should now be taken again.

The SPEAKER. That is exactly what is going to happen if the gentleman will give the Chair a chance to put the question.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, if the Chair will indulge me, the vote by tellers on ordering a second was no vote, because immediately upon the announcement of the result of the vote the point of order of no quorum was made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ascertain what the Reporter's notes show.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact, after the vote was taken by tellers, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE] did make the point of order of no quorum. I do not think anyone understood that that was on the vote by tellers, but if he claims it was, the vote now would be on ordering a second by tellers.

Mr. TRIBBLE. That was the purpose of my making the point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the Reporter's notes show that the gentleman from Georgia is correct in his contention as to when he made the point of order of no quorum.

Mr. PALMER. The point of order of no quorum was made, and the Chair then counted, and the Chair determined that no quorum was present. A motion was then made that the House adjourn. That vote was taken by the yeas and nays and the roll disclosed the presence of a quorum. That settles the question of whether a quorum is present, and the motion to suspend the rules having been seconded by a majority by tellers, there is nothing in order now except 40 minutes of debate.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. Let us take the vote by tellers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I distinctly remember the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE]——

The SPEAKER. There is no question about that.

Mr. ADAMSON. But in regard to the other matter. The gentleman asked the question as to what the roll call would be on, whether it would be on tellers or on the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. It was on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then after the gentleman had made it he asked the question.

The SPEAKER. Of course you could not vote on a motion until after it was made.

Mr. ADAMSON. But when the point of no quorum is settled——

The SPEAKER. But there is a quorum here now.

Mr. ADAMSON. Of course; but the question is, ought the vote by tellers be taken again?

The SPEAKER. What is the statement of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Georgia claims that he made a point of no quorum on the vote by tellers. I do not think the Speaker so understood——

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I was watching closely the proceedings, and if the Speaker will allow me to state——

Mr. MANN (continuing). If so, the proper thing to have done would have been to have had the roll call on seconding the motion.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota (continuing). After the Speaker put the question, the gentleman from Georgia made the point of no quorum.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Correct.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. That is what transpired; and then the motion to adjourn was made.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Correct.

The SPEAKER. A motion to adjourn takes precedence over the other, and the thing to do is to vote on whether this matter is seconded or not. The question is on seconding the motion to suspend the rules.

The question was taken; and the tellers (Mr. PALMER and Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina) reported that there were—ayes 140, noes 27.

Mr. TRIBBLE and Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I move to adjourn.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that the motion to adjourn is dilatory.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count to see if a quorum is present.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TRIBBLE. We have just had the Members of the House pass through tellers, and the record shows there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The record does not show anything of the sort. The record shows that a quorum did not vote.

Mr. TRIBBLE. All right.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and eighty-seven Members are present—not a quorum.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, I move to adjourn.

Mr. PALMER and Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that motion is dilatory.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is dilatory. The question is on seconding the motion to suspend the rules. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 212, nays 45, answered "present" 3, not voting 163, as follows:

So a second was ordered.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. CARLIN with Mr. ANTHONY.

Mr. BARNHART with Mr. CHANDLER of New York.

Mr. LEE of Georgia with Mr. CRAMTON.

Mr. BOOHER with Mr. LEWIS of Pennsylvania.

Mr. BROUSSARD with Mr. SLEMP.

Mr. CONNELLY of Kansas with Mr. WALLIN.

Mr. DONOHOE with Mr. GOOD.

Mr. FINLEY with Mr. JOHNSON of Washington.

Mr. GARD with Mr. KAHN.

Mr. HENRY with Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia.

Mr. HENSLEY with Mr. WINSLOW.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I voted "yea." I am paired with the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. UNDERWOOD, but I do not think he voted. Therefore I withdraw my vote of "yea" and vote "present."

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present, and the House seconds the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] has 20 minutes and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] 20 minutes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the Chair advise me when I have consumed five minutes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, on account of the fact that we are to have a caucus to-night, I rise to move to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] has the floor.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from South Carolina and other gentlemen that there is no reason why the consideration of this bill should interfere with the caucus to-night. Forty minutes' debate will take us only up to 20 minutes of 7, and the bill can be easily passed in order to allow the Members to get to the caucus at 8 o'clock.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is a Federal child-labor bill. The bill in its original form is the best thought of all of the social workers of the country who have given time and attention to this very important question of child labor. The bill was originally drafted by the National Child Labor Committee after a conference with child-labor committees of various States. I want to say at the outset that in its present form, though it is changed somewhat from the original form, it is satisfactory to and has the unqualified approval and indorsement of every child-labor association of America, not only the National Child Labor Committee but also the various child-labor associations of the different States as well.

Now, what the bill does is this: It fixes a standard for child labor, and prohibits from interstate commerce the product of any mine, or quarry, or any mill, factory, or workshop which is produced by children below that standard, and the standard is this: Sixteen years in mines and quarries and 14 years in mills, factories, workshops, canneries, and manufacturing establishments, and provides an eight-hour day, six days a week, and no nightwork; that is, there is to be no labor for children between the hours of 7 p. m. and 7 a. m.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMER. For a question.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Suppose a boy 15 years old were gathering peaches in Georgia and those peaches were carried to the cannery and he had a part in canning them, and those were shipped from the State of Georgia?

Mr. PALMER. He would not be working in a cannery.

Mr. TRIBBLE. But suppose he were working in a cannery.

Mr. PALMER. If he were working in a cannery and were under 14 years of age, the product of his labor would be kept out of interstate commerce.

Mr. BURNETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PALMER. I will.

Mr. BURNETT. There seems to be an impression among some of my colleagues of the South that this would prevent the working of girls in little home canning clubs. There is nothing of that kind, is there?

Mr. PALMER. There is nothing of that kind. The kitchen stove is not a cannery, and a kitchen cannery is not within the purview of this act. Neither does it apply to plantation or farm labor. It must be in the quarries or the mines where the limit is 16 years, and in the workshop where the limit is 14 years.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I will ask the gentleman if he would not favor a bill that provided that cotton could not be shipped out of the South if boys 16 years of age were employed who were raised in the cotton fields instead of going to school?

Mr. PALMER. I am discussing this bill. I have said this does not apply to production in the cotton fields. There is nothing new about these standards. The fact is that 15 States in the Union have adopted the age of 16 years with respect to mines and quarries, and 14 States have adopted the standard age of 14 years in respect to labor in workshops, mills, and factories; 22 States have adopted the standard of forbidding anything more than eight hours a day for children, and I think about an equal number of States have adopted the standard of forbidding any work on the part of any children.

Mr. AUSTIN. Would the gentleman include in his remarks a list of those States?

Mr. PALMER. Yes; and I will say that the report of the committee, which is very full on this subject, does include the names of all the States where these standards have been fixed.

Now, the purpose of this bill is to take this accepted and generally employed standard——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has consumed five minutes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. PALMER. Just one moment. I have the floor; and to analyze that standard——

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, can not a Member make a point of no quorum at any time?

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from South Carolina rise?

Mr. RAGSDALE. To make a point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ascertain by counting.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that that is dilatory.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Why, it is apparent on the face of it, Mr. Speaker, that a quorum is not here.

The SPEAKER. The rule about it is that but one motion to adjourn is in order under a suspension of the rules unless a quorum disappears. The Chair will count. (After counting.) One hundred and fifty-one Members are present—not a quorum.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I move that we do now adjourn.

Mr. PALMER. I move a call of the House, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the House has voted down a motion to adjourn since the motion to suspend the rules was made, and under paragraph 8 of rule 16, which reads—

> Pending the motion to suspend the rules, the Speaker may entertain one motion that the House adjourn; but after the result thereon is announced he shall not entertain any other motion until the vote is taken on suspension—

But one motion could be made since the motion was made to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. Let the gentleman read the rest of that.

Mr. RAGSDALE. But, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. I have read the entire rule.

The SPEAKER. You read the entire rule, but you did not read the decisions on it.

Mr. PALMER. The rule is so plain that there ought not to be any doubt about it.

The SPEAKER. Section 5744, volume 5, Hinds' Precedents, reads:

> A motion to suspend the rules having been entertained and one motion to adjourn having been voted on, another motion to adjourn may not be made unless the failure of a quorum be demonstrated.

Now, the Chair will inquire of the gentleman from Illinois if that is not the exact situation here?

Mr. MANN. No. I think if the point of no quorum is made, and the Chair decides there is no quorum present, then a motion to adjourn is in order.

Mr. RAGSDALE. All that took place, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. I did not understand the Speaker to have declared that there is no quorum present.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Yes; he did.

Mr. MANN. Just now?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I was not aware of it.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RUSSELL. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] lose the floor when a point of order is made?

The SPEAKER. Until that is disposed of he does; and the Chair has announced that there is not a quorum present, and now the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] moves to adjourn.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, can a Member take another Member off the floor by raising a point of no quorum?

The SPEAKER. He can on a point of order.

Mr. RUSSELL. If an order is sent out to bring Members in, would not the gentleman from Pennsylvania have the right to the floor?

The SPEAKER. He would not. The trouble is that the quorum has disappeared. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] raised the point of no quorum, as he had the absolute right to do, and after that nothing except one of two things is in order—a motion to adjourn or a call of the House. Now, if it had turned out on the Speaker's count that there was a quorum here he would not have had any right to make a second motion to adjourn, although there is a decision here that sort of squints that way, but does not decide it clearly.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRISP. The House having seconded this motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill, if the House should adjourn would not this motion come up as the unfinished business on the next day that the suspension of the rules was in order?

The SPEAKER. It undoubtedly would.

Mr. PALMER. That would be four days before the end of the session.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] moves to adjourn. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. PALMER. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 45, noes 124.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 34, nays 184, not voting 205, as follows:

So the House refused to adjourn.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. ADAMSON with Mr. BARTHOLDT.

Mr. DICKINSON with Mr. BARTON.

Mr. DOUGHTON with Mr. DAVIS.

Mr. DUPRÉ with Mr. FAIRCHILD.

Mr. EVANS with Mr. FORDNEY.

Mr. HAYDEN with Mr. GREEN of Iowa.

Mr. MOON with Mr. HAYES.

Mr. MONTAGUE with Mr. LEWIS of Pennsylvania.

Mr. MORRISON with Mr. MORIN.

Mr. POU with Mr. WOODRUFF.

Mr. SLAYDEN with Mr. WINSLOW.

Mr. SAUNDERS with Mr. J. I. NOLAN.

Mr. UNDERWOOD with Mr. KAHN.

Mr. KINDEL. Mr. Speaker, I should like to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall, listening, when his name should have been called?

Mr. KINDEL. No; I was not.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman can not vote.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, how many Members voted?

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and seventeen Members voted, and it takes only 213 to make a quorum now. There are 11 vacancies.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] to use his time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I am not opposed to the prohibition of child labor by the States of the Union, but I am opposed to the Federal Government under the pretense of regulating interstate commerce usurping the powers of the State and fixing the hours of labor for its citizens. The Legislature of the State of South Carolina at this session is considering a bill seeking to raise the age for child labor from 12 to 14 years. Notwithstanding any view I might hold as to the age which children should be forbidden to work in the State of South Carolina, or any view you might hold, I think it is the right of that State and not that of the Federal Government to say at what age a child should be prohibited from working in a factory, cannery, or workshop within the State of South Carolina. Step by step an effort is being made to substitute the power of the Federal Government for that of the State. Under the guise of regulating interstate commerce we now seek to enact the laws fixing the hours during which citizens of the various States may work.

My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] says that this bill does not prohibit one working in a cannery on a farm. It prohibits the shipment in interstate commerce of the products of any mill, cannery, workshop, factory, and so forth, manufactured or produced, in whole or in part, by a child under the age of 14. What is a cannery if it be not a place where fruit and vegetables are canned? How many cans must be put up to bring a cannery within the provision of the law? What shall constitute a cannery? From the orchard peaches are brought into the home of the farmer, and there he and his children and the children of his neighbors, 13 years old—under the age of 14—can the peaches. Are these canned peaches to be denied the right of interstate commerce? As far as the cotton mills are concerned, does this prohibition refer only to the labor in the cotton mills, or does it refer to those who contribute in part to the production of the cotton that is manufacured in the cotton mill? Who is to say what construction will be placed upon the bill by the inspectors and thereafter by the courts who shall pass upon it?

No matter whether or not you gentlemen from South Carolina, Georgia, North Carolina, and other States of the Union favor the prohibition of child labor, I ask, are you willing to surrender the right of your respective States to enact those laws in accord with your own views on the subject?

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] says that there are 16 or 17 States that have laws prohibiting the labor of children under 14 years of age. If this be so, then why insist on this legislation? Conditions differ in different States of the Union. No demand has been shown for this legislation. You have not heard from your constituents any demand for this legislation. Under the pretense of regulating interstate commerce we are to take from the States the power of controlling the hours of labor and place it under the control of the Federal Government. I ask my colleagues on this side of the House to vote against the bill.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina makes the point of no quorum, and there is no quorum present.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

Mr. MANN. The House can not give unanimous consent when there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina moves that the House adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RAGSDALE) there were 13 ayes and 97 noes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already announced that no quorum is present.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk called the roll.

The SPEAKER. One hundred and eighty-six Members have answered to their names; not a quorum.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 93, nays 114, answered "present" 1, not voting 216, as follows:

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I voted "No." I am paired with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. I desire to withdraw that vote and answer "present."

The name of Mr. MANN was called, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is not present.

Mr. MANN. May I ask what was the announcement of the Chair?

The SPEAKER. Yeas 92, nays 113, present 1.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. We are operating under a call of the House.

Mr. MANN. No. A call of the House was ordered and then the gentleman from Pennsylvania moved to adjourn.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I made a motion to adjourn which has been voted down. If the House does not want to adjourn, we will get the Members and do business, and I move a call of the House. The roll call was on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a motion was made and carried awhile ago for a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. Was there not a motion for a call of the House awhile ago that prevailed?

The SPEAKER. Yes; they had a call of the House, but the business under the call of the House has never been dispensed with. In the first place, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] moved a call of the House; we had a call of the House and failed to develop a quorum.

Mr. MANN. Which was in progress and never has been dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. That is what I say.

Mr. MANN. It is in progress.

The SPEAKER. It is still a part and parcel of the call of the House. If the gentleman wants to make a motion to send out and have the Members arrested, the Chair will entertain it very suddenly.

Mr. PALMER. I make the motion, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] moves that writs be issued for the absent Members, and that they be brought in.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, how does a man vote when he comes in?

The SPEAKER. He votes "present" on this vote. The gentlemen who want to vote now, who have come in since that vote on ordering the call of the House—that is, trying to get a quorum—will answer "present."

Mr. MANN. I would like to inquire whether the tally clerk has the tally on the motion to adjourn or on the call of the House?

The SPEAKER. He ought to have the one on the call of the House.

Mr. MANN. I know what he ought to have, but I think he has the other.

Mr. STOUT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STOUT. On a motion to adjourn I voted "nay."

The SPEAKER. It does not make any difference about the motion to adjourn. This motion is on the call of the House to get a quorum. It is a call of the House. Did the gentleman vote on that or not?

Mr. STOUT. I voted on the call of the House.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman does not want to vote on it again.

Mr. STOUT. There was a motion to adjourn in the meantime.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the roll be called again for those who did not answer on the call of the House to vote "present."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. LOGUE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LOGUE. Is it in order now, under the recent motion to adjourn, to change one's vote?

The SPEAKER. That question has been settled. It is too late. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks unanimous consent that the names of those who failed to vote on the call of the House shall now be called by the Clerk. Is there objection?

Mr. MURDOCK. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will not that leave one roll call in the midst of the two halves of the other roll call?

Mr. MANN. Not at all. The motion to adjourn is out of the way, and that roll call is ended.

The SPEAKER. The question of adjourning on the roll call has been settled. The House refused to adjourn; and what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] wishes is to have the names of those who failed to vote on the call of the House called now, because it is easier to do that than it is to find out how these men want to vote.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will not that result in a complete roll call being found in the RECORD in the midst of two halves?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands, but you can do anything on earth by unanimous consent.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. I call for the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. PALMER. I make the motion.

Mr. MANN. The Manual says you can. Although there may not be a quorum present, they may order a roll call again on the call of the House at any time.

The SPEAKER. There is no trouble about it, if the gentlemen who did not vote on the roll call will come forward and separate themselves from those who are standing around there and did vote.

Mr. MANN. I will call the attention of the Speaker to the Manual, page 330, section 752, which says:

But during proceedings under the call——

The SPEAKER. Where is the gentleman reading?

Mr. MANN. From the next paragraph from the bottom, page 330. I read:

But during proceedings under the call the roll may be ordered to be called again by those present.

The SPEAKER. Well, the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER], then, is in order, to have this roll called for the absentees. Those in favor of the motion will say "aye"; those opposed will say "no."

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the absentees on that roll call.

The Clerk again called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this call 245 Members, a quorum, have answered.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings.

Mr. PALMER. I move, Mr. Speaker, to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] moves to dispense with further proceedings under the call. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I ask for a division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 132, noes 10.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, I call for tellers.

The SPEAKER. Tellers are demanded. Those in favor of taking this vote by tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Three gentlemen have risen—not a sufficient number.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of taking the vote by yeas and nays will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Three gentlemen have risen—not a sufficient number. The yeas and nays are refused. The ayes have it, and the motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call is agreed to. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I am entitled to the floor to debate the bill, am I not?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, though time is precious, I want to take a couple of minutes to explain——

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] reserve his time or not?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. A point of no quorum was made.

Mr. MANN. He does not have to, Mr. Speaker, under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows; but the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] has the right to close if he wants to. Does the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] desire to use his time?

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. I desire to use my time. I reserved it.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania want to speak first?

Mr. PALMER. Yes. I want to speak now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, it goes without saying, of course, that I am very anxious to pass this bill. The Committee on Labor, which reported it unanimously, is anxious to pass it. It is in the platforms of all the political parties. The Republican Party, and the Progressive Party, and the Democratic Party, and the Nation have declared for this kind of legislation. The country is for it, as it is for very few things in either branch of Congress to-day. [Applause.]

A little while ago I made a motion to adjourn, for this reason: That a caucus of the Democratic Party has been called to meet in the Hall of the House here at 8 o'clock to-night to consider important proposed legislation, and in order that that caucus might meet on time and in order that I might not be responsible for interfering with it I made the motion to adjourn. The House voted down that motion, and is of a temper to do business, and therefore I think we might well postpone our caucus for a couple of hours in order to put this bill through the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And therefore, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that the caucus, which was called for 8 o'clock, will be deferred for a little while, and if the Members on this side who want to stand by party pledges and by the little children of the Nation will stand by for just a few minutes we will pass this bill through the House and hold our caucus and pass our ship-purchase bill also to-night. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I ask the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] to use some of his time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FITZGERALD). The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] is recognized.

Mr. BELL of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that that is a dilatory motion.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Why is it dilatory? A speech has been made.

Mr. BELL of Georgia. I insist on my motion.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. PALMER. I make the point of order that that is dilatory. We have just had a roll call, upon which a quorum was developed.

Mr. RAGSDALE. A point of order, Mr. Speaker. It has been at least half an hour since the motion to adjourn was made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present occupant of the chair is not prepared to hold that this motion is dilatory, as now advised. The present occupant of the chair has not been present during all the proceedings, but he is informed that in the absence of a quorum a motion to adjourn was made.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the motion to adjourn is not in order, the presence of a quorum having been developed; and only one motion to adjourn can be made pending the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I may be in error; but as I recall the matter there has been one motion made to adjourn, which motion was defeated with a quorum present, since the motion to suspend the rules was made, and under the rule there can be only one motion to adjourn pending the motion to suspend the rules when a quorum is present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is now informed that since the motion to suspend the rules was made a motion was made that the House adjourn, and the House on that motion refused to adjourn. Paragraph 8 of Rule XVI provides:

> Pending a motion to suspend the rules, the Speaker may entertain one motion that the House adjourn; but after the result thereon is announced he shall not entertain any other motion till the vote is taken on suspension.

[Applause.]

The House having already acted on the motion to adjourn, under the rule the Chair is prohibited from entertaining the motion a second time, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. BELL of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, may I ask if there was a quorum present at the time when the motion to adjourn was voted down?

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is attempting to dispose of one point of order.

Mr. RAGSDALE. It is along that very line that I wish to be heard. At the time that the motion to adjourn was made the Speaker made a count of this House and it developed at that particular period of time that there was no quorum present, and I believe that the only time we have voted on the motion to adjourn was when there was no quorum present. Subsequently on a call of the House it was developed that there was a quorum here.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the notes of the Journal Clerk show that a quorum was present.

Mr. MANN. I understand; but let me make a statement of what the fact was. The motion to suspend the rules was made, and a second was ordered by tellers. On the vote by tellers no quorum appeared. The point of no quorum was made, and the Speaker declared that no quorum was present, whereupon a motion to adjourn was made, and on that motion no quorum appeared; after the motion to adjourn had been disagreed to the Speaker again ordered the call of the House to be completed, and so, as a matter of fact, when that motion to adjourn was made there was no quorum present, and that declaration had been made by the Speaker.

Mr. RAGSDALE. And it being shown affirmatively once that there was no quorum present the motion to adjourn now is in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FITZGERALD). The Chair has before him the notes of the Journal Clerk.

Mr. RAGSDALE demanded the yeas and nays, which were ordered.

The roll was called, and the yeas were 34 and nays 183, and so the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

There were 217 Members present. The Chair is informed that 213 constitute a quorum as the House is at present constituted.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, since that period of time the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] moved to adjourn, and it developed that there was no quorum, and then the gentleman from Pennsylvania demanded a call of the House, and thereafter a quorum was developed, but at the time the motion to adjourn was made there was no quorum. The quorum has developed since the call of the House, and therefore I contend that my motion is in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Since the motion to suspend the rules was submitted to the House, a motion was made to adjourn, and on that motion the yeas and nays were ordered and the House refused to adjourn with a quorum present, as disclosed by the roll call. Under the rule, a motion to adjourn having been submitted since the motion to suspend the rules was presented to the House, with a quorum present, the Chair is prohibited from entertaining another motion to adjourn until the vote is taken on the suspension, and the point of order being made against the gentleman's motion, the Chair is compelled to sustain the point of order.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Before the present occupant of the chair took the chair, it was held by the Speaker that a motion to adjourn was in order under the rule where a quorum was not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is true; but that situation does not exist at this time. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE].

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE].

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the motion by which the House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina can not yield to the gentleman from Georgia for that purpose.

Mr. MANN. You can not reconsider a motion to adjourn, anyhow.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. RAGSDALE. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. And I make the point of order that that motion is dilatory.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia makes the point of order that there is not a quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and thirteen members present, a quorum,, and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. RAGSDALE] is recognized for five minutes.

[Mr. RAGSDALE addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman who has just spoken says that this bill will destroy the industries in certain Southern States; that it yields to the Federal Government control of the industries in those States. Mr. Speaker, this bill will not interfere in the least with the industries of the Southern States or of any other State. Any Southern State that will stop the exploitation of child labor—that will stop sacrificing the lives of its little children—will not be affected in the least degree by this law, but all this law says is that if you insist on doing that thing you will keep within the confines of your own State when you do it, and you shall not exercise a right under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution to bring the products of your child labor into competition with other States where they have some respect and some regard for the lives of the little children of the country. [Applause.]

I wish I had the time to discuss somewhat the constitutionality of this question, but I have not in three minutes. This very Congress, however, passed a convict-labor bill prohibiting the shipment in interstate commerce of the products of convict labor; and if we have the right to do that, and we have, then we have the right to prohibit all interstate-commerce shipments of the products of child labor, which ought to be of a great deal more concern to this country than any other form of labor.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield to me in order that I might make a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. PALMER. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman inform us if the special rule for the consideration of the shipping bill is to come in to-morrow?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not sure about that, but if it does not there will be an appropriation bill under consideration, as well as other business, which we better dispose of one way or the other as soon as we can, because if we expect to avoid an extra session we better be at work.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman expect the shipping bill to come in?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I can not answer that question now; I am not prepared to answer it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

CHILD LABOR.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I do not care to use any more of the time allotted to me. [Applause.]

Mr. PALMER. Mr. Speaker, while I have time remaining, owing to the lateness of the hour I shall not use any further time, and I ask for a vote. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is, Shall the rules be suspended and the bill passed?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. Evidently a sufficient number, and the yeas and nays are ordered.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. RAGSDALE. But I made the point of order of no quorum present, and the roll has not yet begun.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will count and will ask gentlemen not to move, so there will be no confusion. [After counting.] Two hundred and twenty-one gentlemen are present, a quorum——

Mr. RAGSDALE. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand tellers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 233, nays 43, answered "present" 2, not voting 145, as follows:

[Roll No. 64.]

So, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. GILLETT and Mr. SUTHERLAND, for bill, with Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina, against.

Mr. ROGERS and Mr. PLUMLEY, for bill, with Mr. SAUNDERS, against.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Speaker, I find I voted "nay." I wish to withdraw that vote and vote "present." I understand that Mr. ROGERS did not vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. He did not vote.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. WHALEY, for three days, on account of sickness.

To Mr. HENSLEY, for three days, on account of sickness.

To Mr. BARNHARDT, indefinitely, on account of illness and death in his family.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 17168. An act to authorize the North Alabama Traction Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Tennessee River at or near Decatur, Ala.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 18783. An act to increase the limit of cost of the United States post-office building and site at St. Petersburg, Fla.;

H. R. 16896. An act for the relief of Col. Richard H. Wilson, United States Army; and

H. R. 9584. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to sell the present old post office and the site thereof in the city of Jersey City, N. J.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 8 o'clock and 59 minutes p. m.) the House, under its previous order, adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 16, 1915, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a certified copy of the findings of fact and conclusion in the case of D. I. Smith et al. v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 1608), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the resolution of the Senate (S. J. Res. 210) to authorize the President to invite certain Governments to send delegates to the Pan American Medical Congress, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1409), which said joint resolution and report were referred to the Committe of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ASHBROOK: A bill (H. R. 21451) providing for artificial limbs for soldiers every two years; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. PAGE of North Carolina: A bill (H. R. 21452) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to audit and adjust certain claims of the State of North Carolina; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. VOLLMER: A bill (H. R. 21453) to repeal sections 35 to 49, inclusive, of the act of June 13, 1898, concerning mixed flour, as amended by act of April 12, 1902; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. CRISP: A bill (H. R. 21454) to prohibit banks holding membership in the Federal reserve system from receiving deposits when insolvent, and prescribing penalties therefor; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. BRYAN: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 422) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By the SPEAKER (by request): Memorial of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota, urging upon Congress to reconsider and pass the Sheppard-Hobson prohibition-amendment resolution; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also (by request), a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Kansas, asking Congress to take necessary steps to deal with the Cimarron River situation as affecting the lands of Kansas and Oklahoma; to the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands.

By Mr. ASHBROOK: Memorial of the Legislature of the State of Ohio, relative to the protection of passengers and shipping interests on the high seas and Great Lakes; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. ALLEN: Memorial of the Legislature of the State of Ohio, respecting protection of passengers and shipping interests on the high seas and the Great Lakes; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. HAWLEY: Memorial of the Legislature of the State of Oregon, asking that Congress authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to make a study of local conditions necessary to formulate plans for public-road development, etc.; to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Oregon, favoring the enactment of Senate bill 6217, entitled "A bill to increase the efficiency of the Organized Militia, and for other purposes"; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota: Memorial of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota urging Congress to reconsider and pass the resolution submitting the Sheppard-Hobson prohibition amendment to the Constitution; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 16, 1915.

(Legislative day of Monday, February 15, 1915.)

The Senate reassembled at 12 o'clock noon, on the expiration of the recess.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT FORT WORTH, TEX.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, out of order, to submit a report from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I object. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Dillingham	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Fall	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Borah	Fletcher	Norris	Smith, Mich.
Brady	Goff	O'Gorman	Smith, S. C.
Brandegee	Gore	Overman	Smoot
Bristow	Gronna	Page	Stephenson
Bryan	Hitchcock	Penrose	Sterling
Burleigh	Hollis	Perkins	Sutherland
Burton	James	Pittman	Swanson
Camden	Johnson	Pomerene	Thomas
Catron	Jones	Reed	Thompson
Chilton	Kenyon	Robinson	Townsend
Clapp	Kern	Root	Vardaman
Clark, Wyo.	Lane	Saulsbury	Walsh
Clarke, Ark.	Lippitt	Shafroth	Warren
Colt	Lodge	Sheppard	Weeks
Crawford	McCumber	Sherman	White
Culberson	McLean	Shively	Williams
Cummins	Martin, Va.	Simmons	Works

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-six Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent to submit a report.

Mr. CULBERSON. From the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none. The bill reported will be stated by title.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON], from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (S. 7545) to provide for the acquisition of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Fort Worth, Tex., and for the remodeling, altering, and so forth, of the present post-office building, reports it without amendment and submits a report (No. 986) thereon.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas offered the report before I objected, but I have no objection now to its being made, as it has already been reported, but I shall object to any further morning business.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, what is the request?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is not any; it is all over. The request was for leave to submit a report, and the report has been received and the bill has gone to the calendar.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. THOMPSON. I ask unanimous consent to offer an amendment to the Agricultural appropriation bill (H. R. 20415). The committee is now considering the appropriation bill, and I should like to have it go to the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I shall object to any morning business being received.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Utah if he will object to a report of the Agricultural appropriation bill?

Mr. SMOOT. I did not hear what the Senator said.

Mr. GORE. I was asking whether the Senator would feel obliged, under his statement, to object to the report of the Agricultural appropriation bill?

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator from Oklahoma if the bill is ready to be reported?

Mr. GORE. Not yet. The report is being written now. I had intended to have it ready this morning.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator I will wait until that time arrives, and then I will see.

PURCHASE OF SHIPS.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, yesterday the Chair honored me with an appointment on the special committee to investigate certain shipping matters. It is extremely inconvenient for me to serve on that committee, and I ask to be excused.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senate excuse the Senator from Massachusetts? Consent is given. The Chair appoints the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] in place of the Senator from Massachusetts.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. REED to amend Rule XXII of the standing rules of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to lay the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] on the table.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa stated to me last evening that he desired to address the Senate upon his amendment for 15 or 20 minutes. If I can do so, with the general understanding that I shall have the privilege of the floor to renew my motion immediately upon the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Iowa, I will withdraw the motion. Otherwise, I will let it stand. I, of course, desire to give the Senator from Iowa a fair opportunity to present his motion.

Mr. CUMMINS. I could not quite hear the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. None of us can hear as long as the business of the Senate is being transacted between individual Senators on the floor, and 15 or 20 are talking at the same time. I made this statement, that the Senator from Iowa had last evening said to me that he desired 15 or 20 minutes to present his motion or resolution to the Senate, and that his opportunity would be cut off if I insisted on my motion to lay on the table. I am willing to withdraw my motion to lay on the table if by general consent I shall be entitled to the privilege of the floor to renew it as soon as the Senator from Iowa concludes his remarks.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Missouri that when the Senator from Iowa concludes I may want to occupy the floor for a few moments.

Mr. REED. On that same question?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. REED. Well, I will include the Senator's speech in my request. I am not asking the Senate to formally agree; I only mean to arrive at a general understanding which will be observed as a matter of good faith. I expect to renew the motion, if I withdraw it, as soon as these two Senators have concluded.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, there may be other Senators who may want to be heard on this same motion. It seems to me that it is a little unusual for a Senator to hold the Senate and allow certain Senators to speak and ask them to close debate at that time.

Mr. REED. It seemed to me that courtesy might well be accorded to the Senator from Iowa, but if I can not have the understanding that I will be permitted to have the floor I will not withdraw the motion.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I shall not object, but there is no understanding, so far as I am concerned, that any Senator can yield the floor and then retake it at any time it suits his convenience.

Mr. REED. I will leave it to the honor of the Senate, and I will take the liberty of withdrawing the motion.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I do not want it understood that my honor is involved in this. If I want to speak and can get the floor, I will speak on this or any other motion, regardless of the wishes of the Senator from Missouri or anybody else; that is, if I can get the recognition of the Chair.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is it possible for the Senate by unanimous consent to agree that the presiding officer of the Senate shall recognize the Senator from Missouri at a specified time?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate can not take away from the presiding officer the right to recognize a Senator.

Mr. REED. I shall ask for recognition immediately after the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] shall have concluded his remarks, if he gets the floor after the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Can a Senator retain the floor, even by unanimous consent, under the condition and under the motion now pending by the Senator from Missouri?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to lay on the table, of course, is not debatable. There is not any doubt about that.

Mr. REED. I was simply desirous of according a courtesy to the Senator from Iowa, but it is perfectly manifest that the Senators on his side of the Chamber do not want that courtesy extended.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I desire, of course, to say a few words in regard to the amendment I have proposed, but I shall not detain the Senate for a very great length of time—not over half an hour. However, I have no authority to speak for anyone else, and I do not want any courtesy extended to me to bind anybody else.

Mr. REED. The Senator says he does not want any courtesy extended to him?

Mr. CUMMINS. I said while I would be very glad to have the courtesy extended to me, yet I did not want that courtesy, which I assumed was personal largely, to draw any other Senator into its operation. I can not speak for other Senators upon the floor, and I do not intend to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I will take the chances on getting the floor, and I will withdraw the motion in order that the Senator from Iowa may make his remarks.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the question of cloture in the Senate is one upon which I think honest men can differ. I know that there are a great many reasons for preserving unlimited debate in this body, and I have been very much impressed—Mr. President, I should like to have order.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, we can not hear anything the Senator from Iowa is saying.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate has decided a great many times that it is a self-governing body.

Mr. CATRON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield for a question.

Mr. CATRON. This amendment, I understand, has not been printed. I suggest that it be read before the Senator proceeds with his remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

The SECRETARY. At the end of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] proposes the following amendment:

Add, at the end of the substitute, the following:

"This rule shall not apply to any bill, motion, resolution, or question upon which Senators belonging to any political party have held a caucus and passed a resolution or declaration in any form attempting to bind the members of such party in the Senate to vote in any particular way and where the application of the rule is moved by a Senator belonging to any such political party.

"The fact respecting the existence of such caucus, resolution, or declaration shall be determined in the first instance by a committee of five Senators appointed by the presiding officer, who shall report within two days, and upon its report by the Senate without debate."

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, as I was just observing, there is room for a very wide difference of opinion with regard to the propriety or wisdom of imposing a cloture upon the deliberations or debates of the Senate.

I have given due heed, I think, to the arguments for and against the limitation of debate, and without entering into the reasons which have influenced me, I desire to say that in my opinion, the weight of the argument is in favor of a limitation of debate in the Senate. When I say that, I am not to be understood as saying that I believe the majority of the Senate should at any time have the power to absolutely foreclose further debate, but I do think that a proportion of the Senate—I have not reached a definite conclusion upon that point, whether it should be a majority or whether two-thirds of the Senate—ought to have the power to put into effect a rule which will automatically close debate after a reasonable time, after every Senator has had an opportunity to reasonably discuss the question before the body.

There are, however, two conditions which ought to be excluded from the operation of any such rule. There are two conditions against which a filibuster, so called, is not only justified but, I think, imperatively demanded. Whenever the Chief Executive of the country attempts to impose his will upon the Senate, and thus to preclude or prevent that fair and open mind to which all discussion ought to be directed, when Senators do not feel that they are at liberty to vote upon a particular measure in any way which their judgment and their conscience direct them to vote, then a rebellion in the form of a filibuster is not only justified but, I think, it is absolutely required if we would preserve the freedom and the dignity of the Senate of the United States. I recognize, however, that there is no practicable way in which the existence of that fact or that condition can be shown. I do not know of any method through which proof could be offered of that fact. Therefore I pass it without further consideration.

But there is another condition, Mr. President, which justifies a political minority in prolonging debate to the uttermost limit of their strength. That condition is a caucus held by Senators which, under a rule adopted by some political organization, binds or attempts to bind all Senators belonging to that political organization to vote in a particular manner. I have already many times expressed my opinion with regard to the practice of a caucus; I have expressed it with regard to the party of which I am a member as emphatically and as indignantly as I express it now with regard to my friends upon the other side of the Chamber. I think that a caucus held by any political party with respect to legislation that is intended to have for its effect the foreclosing of a matter under debate, that is intended to have for its effect the subversion of the judgment and the conscience of Members of the Senate, is not only intolerable in a free country but that it ought to be made unlawful.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Iowa if that was his opinion when he was governor of the great State of Iowa?

Mr. CUMMINS. It was. It was not only my opinion but it was publicly expressed and continually insisted upon. I was once a member of the Legislature of Iowa, and I absolutely declined to enter a legislative caucus for the purpose of determining the attitude of the members of the party to which I belonged upon a legislative matter that was then pending before the general assembly. In all my life I never entered a caucus upon any such subject, and I have always denounced it, just as I am denouncing it now.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. If I am in error, of course I want to be corrected; but my recollection is that the Senator from Iowa, for the purpose of accomplishing a number of very much needed reforms in his State, which were accomplished by him, held a good many conferences and meetings with the majority members of the legislature, to the end that a common purpose and concerted action might be established, and was established, without which his reforms would have been impossible.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, during the seven years I was governor of the State of Iowa there was not a single caucus upon legislation held by the members of the general assembly of that State by either party. Long ago it became disreputable in the State of Iowa for any political party or the members of any political party organization in the general assembly to hold a secret caucus and endeavor in that way to bind the members of the body to any particular course upon legislation.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator seems to overlook the fact that, out of regard for his feelings, I used the word "conference."

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, Mr. President, there is a vast difference between a caucus and a conference. It is true that a conference may be just as vicious as a caucus; it makes no difference what name is used. The vital thing is what transpires at the conference or the caucus. I have no objection, and no one could have objection, to members of a body who are of the same general mind meeting together and discussing the merits of legislation or the merits of any proposal, whether it be legislation or no. That is not the point I am endeavoring to make.

Inasmuch as the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has referred to a time when I was governor of Iowa, I will say that I know of a good many conferences held during the legislative sessions of those years. Those conferences were not political. Men of both political parties joined in the conferences. I think I know the fact sufficiently well to state it without any qualification, that in no conference ever held in my State during the time I was governor was there even a suggestion that any man who attended such conference felt under the slightest obligation as he passed out of it to do any particular thing.

We have here, though, a case—and I have seen it before—in which 35 or 36 members of a political party met together and acted under a rule which was adopted in 1903, a rule which definitely and specifically declares that when two-thirds of the members of that party vote in favor of a particular question in caucus, the action of the caucus becomes binding upon every member of that political organization, with two or three exceptions which I shall not attempt to repeat, because all Senators will remember the discussion of the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] a few days ago, in which he read and commented upon the exceptions to the rule.

I am not attempting, and I beg you will not believe that I am attempting, to disparage the political organization which now constitutes the majority in this Senate, for what I am saying has been applicable at times just as fully and completely to the party to which I belong as it is now applicable to the party upon the other side of the Chamber.

It seems to me that as free men, independent men, as patriots, as men who have been intrusted with great power to be employed for the good of all the people, we ought to be able to discuss such a question as this without any partisan bias.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa permit me to interrupt him for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Iowa has just said in effect that his argument would apply at times in the past to the party to which he belongs. I should like to say to the Senator from Iowa that in my service in the House of Representatives and here, covering nearly 14 years, I never have known of a binding caucus being held in either House on the part of the Republican Members. I have attended many conferences, but I have always gone out from those conferences with a perfect understanding that I was free to vote as I pleased.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I did not refer in what I said to the action of Republican Members of Congress.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do know, however, that Republican members of other legislative bodies have been in caucus and have done precisely what was a short while ago done by the Democratic Members of the Senate. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I would go further than the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] and remind the Senator from Iowa that at least in my experience of nearly 18 years in this body I do not recall any conference or any caucus on matters of legislation, whereas under the present régime we have witnessed caucuses prolonged for a week, surrounded by great mystery and secrecy, binding the members under a two-thirds rule, and then presenting legislation to this body with a notice that it must be passed by sessions held from early in the morning until late at night, without deliberation or the privilege of studying it.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will understand that I am not speaking of any recent action, or possibly remote action—I know nothing of that—on the part of the Republicans in Congress. I only know that there have been times and places in which the Republican Party has held caucuses and has attempted to bind its members to vote in a particular way. I know it, because I refused absolutely to enter a caucus of that kind when I was a member of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa. But I am not referring at all to what has been done here. I know that the practice has been abolished here in our party, anyhow. I am simply attempting to show that this is a course which has not been peculiar to any one political organization; but it is just as bad though it has been practiced by all the political organizations of the country.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to say, Mr. President, that during the period of time covered by the remarks of the Senator from Pennsylvania the Republican majority generally took its orders from and acted by the direction of one man.

Mr. PENROSE. The Democrats are doing that now.

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment. I understand perfectly what the Senator from Colorado has in his mind, and I know that there was a time when one man, a leader in the Senate, had very great influence. However, as much as I deprecated that influence and as widely as I differed from the man who exercised it, he never had the temerity to call his associates together and attempt by the passage of a resolution to bind them to vote in a particular way. I have been in the Senate now six years, and more, and I have never even been invited to attend a conference of Republicans that had for its purpose the determination of the manner in which Republican Senators should vote upon any measure of legislation or anything that was incident to it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Mississippi for a question.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I want to say at this point of the very interesting observations which the Senator is making that the secret caucus is not more distasteful to the people of his State, those of any other State, or to the people anywhere on earth, than it is to the honest white Democrats of the State of which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor. I do not believe a man running for the legislature in Mississippi could carry a single supervisor's district if he announced that he would be bound by a secret caucus in casting his vote on any question that might come before the legislature. Mississippi had a very notorious experience with the secret caucus in 1910.

The secret caucus is responsible for one of the blackest, most disgraceful, and dirty pages in the history of that great Commonwealth. No self-respecting Mississippian can look back upon that unfortunate period without the blush of shame mantling his or her cheek; but, thank God, the stain has been wiped from the fair name of the State, in so far as it could be effaced by the action of the people. Their first opportunity came in 1911 at the primary election which nominated me for a seat in this Chamber. A more complete, thorough, overwhelming repudiation of the advocates and champions of the secret caucus it is not possible for a people to make, and the system of the secret caucus was denounced, spat upon, by the voters at the polls in a manner which admit of no doubtful interpretation. I am so thoroughly impressed with the iniquity of the system that I am loath to enter into any sort of agreement or understanding that could be construed as consenting on my part to be bound by the vote of any man or any set of men to control my vote on any measure of public importance, especially, Mr. President, if the understanding and caucus action shall be entered into behind closed doors. I feel that I have been instructed by the people of my State to oppose in every honorable and proper way the methods of the secret caucus. I believe that legislation enacted by such methods can not be the voluntary enactment into law of the best judgment of the servants of the people, and therefore it must of necessity be pernicious.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I should be glad to yield to any Senator, but it must be understood that I yield only for a question, and not under circumstances that would take me from the floor, because I feel that I must observe in good faith—and I will observe in good faith—to the implied understanding between the Senator from Missouri and myself when he withdrew his motion to lay my amendment upon the table.

Mr. President, I thought that the advancing civilization of this country, I thought that the influence of the progressive movement upon this country, had annihilated the caucus. I am not now speaking of the progressive movement in the Republican Party any more than I am speaking of the progressive movement in the Democratic Party, or the progressive movement as shown in the organization of a third party; I am speaking of the general advance in political thought; I am speaking of the consensus of opinion, which I think is universal, that in these days men who come into a legislative body to serve the people must be free men, and must be at liberty to vote at all times so that the interests of the country shall be promoted.

I was astonished more than I could well express when the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] a few days ago rose and read from the record of the caucus of 1903 a formal resolution which, by its very terms, attempted to bind one-third of the members of the Democratic organization to any measure upon which two-thirds could agree. I assumed, even in the palmy days of the caucus, even when there was no public opinion challenging the caucus as there is now, that the effect of the caucus would be rather implied than expressed. I assumed that the action of the members of the caucus or the party was dependent rather upon their sense of honor than upon their express obligation entered into formally in the way of a written contract to do a particular thing; and I believe the country was astonished when the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] laid before it the resolution upon which he relied to coerce one-third of the Democratic Members of this body into action favorable to the pending measure.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I should like to have the Senator tell me when I introduced a resolution in the Senate to coerce one-third of the Democratic Senators or to coerce anybody else.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was speaking of the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. I referred specifically to the senior Senator from Missouri. The junior Senator from Missouri will remember that a few days ago his colleague rose and read a resolution of the Democratic caucus held in 1903, and then recited what had occurred at a recent Democratic caucus respecting this bill, and thereupon he declared—I shall not attempt to quote it—that every Democratic Member in this body was bound by the resolution passed a few weeks ago to support this measure.

Mr. REED. Oh, well, that is a very different statement than I understood the Senator to be making. I deem it entirely unnecessary to make further reply.

Mr. CUMMINS. I appeal to those who are about me either to verify or to overthrow my recollection of that remarkable address; but I am not mistaken when I say that the senior Senator from Missouri read a resolution of 1903, which expressly declared that whenever two-thirds of the Members on the Democratic side of the Chamber united in a particular course, then every Democratic Member was bound to pursue that course unless it involved the Constitution of the United States, or some pledge that he had made to his constituents, or—there was one other exception which I do not now recall.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to ask that before the Senator takes his seat he will give the Senate the benefit of his views upon filibustering as well as upon the caucus.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will do it. I said in the very beginning that I do not believe in the filibuster simply because of difference of opinion. I believe that where there is in any body a free and fair debate, where every mind is open and at liberty to reach the conclusion which the conscience behind the mind directs, when the question has been fairly debated, when the period of instructive debate ceases, the vote should be taken. I believe in the rule of a majority. I stated that with candor, I think, and with emphasis. But now, in order that there shall be no dispute about what the resolution was to which I referred,

I read it from the remarks of the Senator from Missouri. This resolution was passed on the 15th day of December, 1903:

Resolved, That hereafter all members of the Senate Democratic caucus shall be bound to vote in accordance with its decision made by a two-thirds vote of all its members upon all questions except those involving a construction of the Constitution or upon which a Senator has made pledges to his constituents or received instructions from the legislature of the State which he represents.

Mr. WEEKS rose.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator from Massachusetts desire to interrogate me?

Mr. WEEKS. I desire to ask a question, Mr. President, namely, whether the Senator from Iowa has appreciated the extreme measures which might be taken by a caucus. For instance, I am informed that at a caucus held at the other end of the Capitol last night a resolution was passed, and has been reported to the House to-day, under which the previous question is to be ordered without debate on a proposal to prevent amendments and pass a bill after six hours' debate, which would mean about 40 seconds to each Member.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, as I view it, there is no way of exaggerating or unduly emphasizing the wrong of a course of that kind. If two-thirds of a caucus can bind the Members to one thing, it can bind them to another. There is no limit to its powers; and if two-thirds of the Democratic Members of this body can compel unison of action between the Democratic Members, then there is no legislative body. The Senate of the United States has ceased to exist, just exactly as the House of Representatives has ceased to exist as a deliberative body. It is controlled in all great measures by the caucus of the prevailing party. But I recall Senators to the language I have just read:

That hereafter all members of the Senate Democratic caucus shall be bound to vote—

Such a surrender of manhood, such an abdication of responsibility, such an utter disregard of the oath which every man takes when he enters this body, I have never before known; and I desire to say this much for my Democratic friends: I do not believe they would pass such a resolution now. I do not believe they would dare to do it; but there has been revived a resolution which savors of medieval tyranny in order to facilitate and speed the progress of this measure. I appeal to every Senator who believes that he is progressive, who is willing to march along the path toward better legislation and toward greater responsibility, to pause when he considers the resolution under which our Democratic friends are now acting.

I repeat that if there is a fair field for debate I think there should be in the power of the Senate a limitation upon debate, for I have too much confidence in my fellow Senators, without regard to their political affiliations, to believe that a measure, after being fully discussed, could be passed which would inflict great injury upon the country of which we are all citizens. But what has been done, so far from giving the majority a right to determine what legislation we shall enact, the caucus has conferred upon a minority the right to determine the character of our legislation. It may not be so in this particular instance, because seven members of the Democratic organization have refused to be bound by this rule; but assuming that they were all bound, assuming that the 16 members of the Democratic part of the Senate were opposed to this bill and were bound to vote for it because 36 members of their organization have declared that it was legislation that ought to be passed, what, then, is the spectacle presented to the American people? Instead of requiring 49 Members of the Senate to pass a law, 36 Members of the Senate have passed a law; and against that usurpation on the part of a minority there is no extent of filibuster that is not justified and defensible.

There has never been a moment of real debate in this Chamber upon the bill now before us, because real debate involves a mind that is willing to listen, involves the opportunity at least for conviction and for change of opinion. Since the action of the caucus, so far as those who have regarded themselves as bound by it are concerned, there has never been an hour in which any discussion of the question would avail those who were participating in it. I do not know how many of these Members are in fact opposed to this measure. I do not know that. I do not propose to say. I only say that we are operating under a rule of the caucus which enabled or is intended to allow 36 members of the caucus to control the action of 53 members.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. REED. What does the Senator think about, say, five or six long-winded gentlemen by a mere filibuster controlling not only the action of one side of the Chamber but the action of both sides? Does he think that is less objectionable than it is for a party to assume responsibility as a party?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I answer the question in this way: If the seven Members to whom the Senator from Missouri refers——

Mr. REED. I am not referring to any particular seven Members. I am stating a situation. Under the present rule, four or five able-bodied physical orators can absolutely stop the entire business of the country by merely standing on the floor and pouring out a ceaseless stream of talk. I ask the Senator if he thinks that is to be preferred over caucus action?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I think they are both thoroughly indefensible.

Mr. REED. I ask if that does not present a case where 6 men control the business of the country instead of 40 or 50, against which the Senator inveighs?

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, Mr. President, sometimes a minority must rebel. There have been occasions when it was necessary for a minority to fight, and fight hard. There are a great many instances of that in the history of the world. If it were not so, Darius would have occupied Greece, and the Saracens would have overrun Europe and given us Mohammed and the Koran instead of Christ and the Bible.

Mr. REED. But, Mr. President, all minority rebellions are not just. A minority may rebel in a bad cause. Since the Senator from Iowa has gone into historical lore I might cite him to the rebellion of one Judas Iscariot and to a somewhat later rebellion by an individual known as Benedict Arnold. Both of these gentlemen were in the minority, but the fact that they were in the minority did not put any virtue into their infamous acts. So minorities may be wrong as well as majorities.

Mr. CUMMINS. Oh, unquestionably.

Mr. REED. And since the Senator has said that there comes a time when a minority may rebel against the tyranny of a majority, it occurs to me that the time has now arrived when a majority may well rebel against the tyranny of a minority.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri is not happy in his reference to Judas Iscariot, for reasons which I shall not develop just now; but from my standpoint a minority has a right to fight if it has no opportunity to speak. I have said many times that if the minority had a chance to convince the individual Members of the Senate through the force or the merit of their argument in my humble judgment the attempt to prevent a vote after fair discussion had ensued can not be justified; but if they enter the contest knowing that the minority of the Senate has held a caucus and has bound enough Members to constitute in the whole a majority, then it would seem to me that any course that would prevent the success of the caucus action and the overthrow of individual judgment and conscience would be right.

Mr. REED. Even though the men who entered into that effort to destroy the caucus action had themselves made an agreement so hard and fast that by force thereof they were holding Members to vote against their judgment and their will? Does the Senator think that is proper? The Senator knows that is exactly the situation in the Senate at the present hour. He knows that the Republican Members held a meeting—whether or not they met all together in one room is immaterial—and they arrived at an absolute agreement to vote to recommit the present bill. He knows that every Member upon that side of the Chamber except two men were drawn into that agreement. He knows that the Republican representatives and seven Democrats all finally united in the agreement. If he does not know the fact, I can tell him that a number of Senators on a number of votes have said that they did not like to vote as they did, but that they were in honor bound by their agreement to so vote because they had pledged themselves to vote to recommit this bill, and that they could not break away from their agreement. I want to ask the Senator if he does not call that sort of agreement a caucus?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I wish to rise to a question of personal privilege. The Senator from Missouri has made a statement which he says the Senator from Iowa knows and every Senator on this side knows. I challenge the truthfulness of that statement, so far as the Senator from Wyoming is concerned. The Senator from Wyoming neither directly nor indirectly has agreed with anybody how he will vote on any question in this body.

Mr. REED. Somebody has made the agreement for him, then.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. No; nobody makes an agreement for the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire——

Mr. REED. I repeat my statement, and I intend to make it good.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The statement is untrue.

Mr. REED. I call the Senator to order, and if he is not called to order I shall bring him to order.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator from Missouri made a statement as to every Republican Senator. I rose to a question of personal privilege and stated that so far as this Senator is concerned he was mistaken in his statement. He repeated it, and I say the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. REED. That is a very different statement than that my statement was untrue. I have no objection to the Senator saying that I am mistaken.

The VICE PRESIDENT. At least let the Senate maintain good humor if it can not maintain order.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, answering, which I want to do fairly, the question of the Senator from Missouri, I say that we have not attended any conference of Republican Senators with regard to this bill. I have no doubt that some Senators have discussed the matter among themselves, but I do say that in so far as I know there is no Republican Senator bound to vote in any particular way with regard to this bill.

I am thoroughly in favor of the limitation of debate proposed by the Senator from Nebraska, reserving only one point of difference, provided always that it is not made to apply to instances in which a caucus has been held and Senators bound to vote in a particular manner without regard to their own judgment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. That ought to be evidence enough that there has been no caucus on our side that binds anybody to vote in any particular way.

Mr. REED. I want to ask the Senator from Iowa if he will say to the Senate and the country that an arrangement has not been made on that side of the Chamber by which the pending bill is to be referred to a committee, and if an agreement has not been arrived at to support that proposition between the Republican side and the seven gentlemen upon this side who have been voting with the Republicans?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know, Mr. President. As far as I am concerned, no such agreement has been entered into.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. If the Senator from Georgia will allow me just a moment, I believe it to be true that there was a time when by discussion among Members on this side of the Chamber it was understood that it was the view of the Senators upon this side that the bill should be recommitted in order that the committee might consider certain amendments which had been proposed, but which it was apparent at that time could not be considered.

Mr. REED. The question of purpose is not in this matter. Everybody has a purpose for every vote he casts. We need not go into the purpose back of any agreement. I want to know if the Senator proposes to tell the country that there has not been an agreement, an understanding, or an arrangement pursuant to which all of the Senators on the other side of the Chamber, with the exception of Senators LA FOLLETTE and NORRIS, have been voting solidly to recommit this bill and if that arrangement between the Republican side and the seven Democrats has not produced a concert of action which has been manifested in something like 25 or 30 votes?

Mr. CUMMINS. I will answer that now, and then I will yield to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

In so far as I know there is no agreement among Senators with respect to anything. I believe it to be true that the views of Senators with regard to recommitting this bill were known; I think known to all of us, because we came to a time when, if there was to be any opportunity for presenting amendments at all, the bill had to be recommitted, and I think the views or purpose of every Senator upon this side of the Chamber were known with regard to that motion. But there was no agreement, there was no obligation, there was no attempt upon the part of the Senators upon this side to impose upon any Senator the force of a caucus or the force of a conference even.

Mr. REED. No; you just all got together, or, if you did not all get together at one time, you just passed the word around in something like this form: "Now, it is understood that we are going to make a motion to recommit the bill, and we are all going to stand to it," and then Members were asked if they would stand to it, and these tactics were pursued until you found out you could get a nearly solid Republican vote. Then an arrangement was made with the seven Democrats to assist in carrying through the scheme. I want to ask you if such pledges were not obtained.

Mr. CUMMINS. If what?

Mr. REED. If pledges were not obtained to the effect that the two different parties to this arrangement would stand together solidly to recommit this bill, and if they have not carried that agreement into effect by voting together even upon mere points of order.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I never heard of any pledge by anyone. I have heard Senators state how they intended to vote. I have a substitute for this bill, and I have been exceedingly anxious to secure an opportunity to present it to the committee or to present it to the Senate, and I have asked, I suppose, every Member upon his side of the Chamber his views with regard to that substitute. I have asked a good many Senators upon the other side of the Chamber other than the seven to whom the Senator from Missouri refers and I intend to ask as many more as I can reach, for I have a perfect right to know what Senators believe with respect to a measure which I intend to propose. But there has not been a suggestion of a caucus or a conference the outcome of which would bind those who were opposed to the measure to vote for it, and that is the vice of the Democratic caucus. I yield to the Senator from Georgia, who has been standing for some time.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, although it would not be necessary to correct the statement of the Senator from Missouri for the benefit of anyone who recalls exactly what has been said on this subject before on this floor, yet I think it is not right that the statement as he has put it in the RECORD this morning should be allowed to go uncontradicted and unchallenged. In the interest of truth and accuracy I think it is well for the Senate and the country to know exactly what happened in reference to this matter.

The Senator refers to certain gentlemen on this side of the Chamber who found themselves unable to agree with their associates on this matter, and who had, I think, given their associates ample notice of their disagreement, some of whom at least were acting under the express rule of the caucus of the party to which the Senators on this side belong, and who conferred among themselves, not with Republicans, and determined among themselves to make an effort to recommit this bill, so that it might be amended in certain particulars, so that those Senators might be enabled, some of them at least, to support it when it came to a final vote. If there is anything like treason in that, the Senator can make the most of it.

Mr. REED. Oh, I did not say anything about treason. The Senator may characterize his own conduct.

Mr. HARDWICK. The Senator undoubtedly has attempted at various times to leave that impression.

The Senator said that this motion or this movement came from the Republican side of the Chamber. The very reverse is true, and the Senator from Missouri either knows it or ought to know it if he can understand the English language, because the truth has been repeatedly stated here before.

Now, pursuing this subject with the utmost frankness and with the candor to which the Senate is entitled: When the seven Democrats who wanted this bill recommitted in order that it might be amended in certain particulars, in the hope that amendments would remove some of their objections to it, made up their minds to make that motion they inquired on the Republican side whether the Republicans were inclined to support that motion, and were informed that it was the belief over there that the Republican side would support that motion. There has been a good deal said——

Mr. REED. And then what?

Mr. HARDWICK. And then what? Then it was made.

Mr. REED. Then it was made?

Mr. HARDWICK. Made by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], just as good a Democrat as sits in this Chamber.

Mr. REED. Then there was an agreement made between seven Democrats on this side and somebody professing to represent the Republicans on the other side?

Mr. HARDWICK. I should not call it an agreement.

Mr. REED. You just said an agreement was made.

Mr. HARDWICK. No.

Mr. REED. What was made?

Mr. HARDWICK. I said we were informed that the Republicans intended to support this motion to recommit. We did not go to the Senator from Missouri for support. We knew he could not support it.

Mr. REED. Why, certainly.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, one more thing. There has been complaint made about a failure to notify Senators.

Mr. REED. No; let me state at this moment——

Mr. HARDWICK. All right; I will yield to the Senator if I may.

Mr. REED. Before I am——

Mr. CUMMINS. Before we go further I should like to have an understanding that I am not to lose the floor.

Mr. REED. Oh, no.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well; I yield further.

Mr. HARDWICK. I would not proceed if it would cut off the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Iowa asked for 15 minutes, and he has had nearly an hour.

Mr. LIPPITT. Most of the time the Senator has challenged the Senator from Iowa with using has been occupied by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. The RECORD will show the fact about that.

Mr. LIPPITT. I think it will.

Mr. REED. The Senator says that the seven Democrats at a meeting agreed that they were going to try to get some amendments on the bill which would enable them to support it, and thereupon they communicated with the Republican side, and that the Republican representative or the Republican side said they would see what could be done. I then asked, "And then what?" And the Senator said an understanding or agreement was made.

Mr. HARDWICK. I did not intend to make that statement. I did not make it. If the Senator will let me answer——

Mr. REED. What was that understanding or agreement?

Mr. HARDWICK. Let me answer. I ask the Senator not to put words in my mouth which I did not use. We were informed that the Republicans would vote for a motion to recommit. Exactly what negotiation or arrangement or conferences or conversations were had on that side I did not know, because I had nothing to do with it. My part was that I agreed to vote to recommit the bill so that certain amendments could be made to it that would enable the Democrats who felt like I did to vote for it when amended. That is all that happened as far as I know. I have considered myself bound, as the Senator knows and as I think I have stated to him, to support a motion to recommit. I am not only bound, but I am willing and anxious to do so.

Mr. REED. Not only willing, but bound to it because it is an agreement. Are you not, Senator?

Mr. HARDWICK. I will answer the Senator.

Mr. REED. Frankly?

Mr. HARDWICK. In utmost frankness, as the Senator knows.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. HARDWICK. Just one thing more. Because of the agreement with my associates on this side——

Mr. REED. And because of the agreement that they made with the Republicans on the other side.

Mr. HARDWICK. I do not so consider that; I do not think they have such an agreement.

Mr. REED. Does not the Senator also know that there are certain Republicans on the other side of the Chamber who have repeatedly said that they would be obliged to vote in a certain way because they were bound to support the motion to recommit?

Mr. HARDWICK. If they were, they were not bound by me and not by any conference I had with them. I want the Senator to get that exactly right.

I want to say one thing more, and then I will trespass no longer on the time of the Senator from Iowa. There was no question of taking advantage of anyone. Within 15 minutes from the time the Republican side knew of this proposed motion—and I think it was within a very short time, only a few minutes after that—it was freely discussed in the Democratic cloakroom. There was no surprise about this thing. You gentlemen knew that this motion was coming.

Mr. REED. I want to say to the Senator, speaking for myself, that I had not the slightest information that it was coming until I heard the motion made on the floor by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE].

Mr. HARDWICK. The discussion was so general on this side that Senators were discussing whether the motion was in order, and had a discussion with the Vice President. I do not know about that, however.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Leave the Vice President out.

Mr. HARDWICK. Of course the Presiding Officer, it was known, had to rule on it, and I assume they discussed it in the cloakroom.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Vice President made no ruling in advance.

Mr. HARDWICK. Be that as it may, the parliamentary experts on this side were discussing whether the motion was in order and made, as soon as it could be made, the precise point that the Vice President sustained and was overruled about. That is all there is to it. I thank the Senator from Iowa for his courtesy.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield for a question. I think I ought to proceed with my remarks, but for a question I would be glad to yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I should like to make a statement just in this connection since I have been brought into this debate.

Mr. CUMMINS. With the understanding that I am not to be taken from the floor, I yield for that purpose.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I have never done anything in politics or in the performance of official duty that I was unwilling for the public to know. I have always maintained that the utmost publicity in public matters is conducive to efficient service and promotive of the public good. All my life I have opposed the secret caucus. If I had my way I should take the door off of every committee room in this Capitol and turn the spot light upon every caucus, that the public might see and hear through the newspapers the discussions of all questions dealing with the affairs of the people. The people have a right to know how their representatives vote in caucus and act on committees and their reasons therefor, because we all understand that the larger amount of legislation is proposed in the caucus and finished in the committee rooms. I have been opposed to the ship-purchase bill since first I informed myself of its provisions. I think I announced my opposition to it before it was known what stand the Democrats of the Senate would take upon it. When this matter under discussion came up at our first conference I said distinctly to my colleagues who were inclined to think and act about it as I do, and I have repeated it at every subsequent conference: "You owe me nothing; there is no agreement between us that is binding upon you to do or not to do anything pertaining to the ship-purchase bill that does not meet your approval or accord with your sense of duty. If we can act in harmony, doing what we believe to be our duty in the premises, and defeat the bill, I shall be greatly pleased, but I want it distinctly understood that my opposition to the bill and my action in opposing the bill will not be determined in the least by what either or all of you may do." I was opposed to the bill then, and I am still opposed to it, and I wanted to recommit it.

In a casual conversation with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] I asked him what would be the attitude of the Republicans on the question of recommitting the bill. He replied that he thought a majority of the Republicans would vote to recommit it. I do not want to be misunderstood about the matter. My first and foremost purpose in recommitting the bill was to kill it. I believe it to be a pernicious piece of legislation, and I wanted to get it off of the calendar. I wanted to recommit it, amend it, or do anything else that I could do to get it out of the way. In discussing the matter further with Senators CLARKE, O'GORMAN, and HARDWICK, and other Senators with whom I have affiliated in this fight against the bill, I stated the result of my conversation with Senator WEEKS but always emphasized the fact that they were not in any way bound to me. I want that understood.

Mr. HARDWICK. If the Senator will pardon me, the Senator understands that several of his colleagues on this side did not go that far.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I understand that several of my colleagues did not go that far. They were opposed to the bill upon principle, some of them on the ground of Government ownership, and yet others who thought the bill might be amended so as to make it possible for them to vote for it; but I was not opposed to it upon that principle. As I have said on the floor of this Chamber heretofore, I would be perfectly willing at the proper time to consider a proper measure looking to State ownership of public utilities, including railroads, ships, and so forth. But not until after the American people—especially that part who compose the great Democratic Party—shall have had an opportunity to consider it and make some declaration upon the policy. I know that the Democratic Party as a political organization does not agree with me on the question of public ownership. But some of the other Senators do not agree with me about that, and, recognizing that fact, I desired to make it clear that there was no agreement between us which in any way hindered or prevented each one of us from following his own judgment and doing the things that his sense of duty might dictate. I am going to vote against the ship-purchase bill; I am going to vote to recommit it if I shall be the only Senator on the floor of this Chamber, be he Republican or Democrat, who votes that way.

Now, that is where I stand on this question. There has been no secrecy or desire on my part, or on that of any of my colleagues that I am aware of, to conceal anything that we have done or said from the whole wide world. There has been no attempt to bind this Senator or that Senator. There has been no attempt by me to control or dictate to any Senator in the performance of his great function here. I think my colleagues with whom I have conferred in this matter understand this question just as I do. Mr. President, I am opposed upon principle to secret caucus instruction. I think such methods are subversive—destructive of the very genius—of the vital principles upon which our Government rests. There is no form of despotism or tyranny so despicable and undemocratic as binding by caucus action the minds and consciences of the servants of the people in the performance of their official duties. Freedom of action and utmost liberty of thought are the necessary prerequisites to writing into the law the best thoughts and highest purposes of the serious-minded, patriotic representatives in this body of the sovereign States of this Republic. I believe in the patriotism of party organization. I believe in the virtue that results from cooperative action on the part of men holding kindred views touching governmental matters and moved forward by a common ambition. Legislation wrought in that way is always helpful, proper, beneficial. It is the ripened fruit of legitimate and sound mental and spiritual processes. But when men are driven—forced—to subordinate their own views and act under the dictation of others, who themselves are sometimes acting under orders, we must expect such laws to partake more of the spirit of tyranny than of a government deriving all of its just powers from the consent of the governed, whose laws should be at all times for the protection of the people.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, inasmuch as this matter has received——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask, while this matter is under consideration, will the Senator from Iowa indulge me?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas under the same conditions.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, there is no mystery about the way and occasion when the seven Senators on this side of the Chamber happened to cooperate. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is substantially correct, that there is what might be considered an understanding about what would be done with the motion to recommit. The circumstances under which the motion was made were in a measure accidental.

On the morning of the day on which I made the motion, after the Sergeant at Arms had called me to the Senate three different times to make a quorum, I came into the Senate Chamber much disposed to make my attendance very brief. I had been going along day after day for about four weeks helping to make a quorum, being paired with the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], doing everything that the most ardent advocate of the bill could do to help it along, feeling that I would allow the responsibility for its passage to rest upon those who favored it. I did not favor it and never had favored it as a permanent proposition.

I discussed the bill with some persons in official life and some persons outside of official life in the late summer of last year before the cotton crop began to move. It was then thought feasible as a temporary means of transporting cotton to foreign markets ready to purchase it. I favored it solely as an emergency proposition. When I came into the Senate Chamber on the morning of the day on which the motion to commit was made, the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] said to me, "The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN], I believe, is working on a plan to beat the shipping bill." I replied, "I am glad to hear this; I shall hunt him up and join him."

In the course of half an hour, or such a matter, I was invited to go to the room of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, where a number of Senators were assembled. I said, "I believe this bill has progressed now for a sufficient length of time to satisfy us that the opposition to it is not going to permit it to pass. There does not seem to be any sentiment in the country in its favor; the pressure in its favor is local and special, and I believe that sooner or later the effort to pass it will give way. I want the bill recommitted to the Committee on Commerce for the purpose of creating a hiatus on our calendar, so that I may move to take up the river and harbor bill and the bill which provides a system of rural credits. I do not want to fritter away the entire session without having made some substantial effort toward something for the people whom I represent." Other Senators had other reasons. As the Senator from Mississippi states, his reason was to defeat the bill entirely; the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] desired to have the bill recommitted for the purpose of amending it; and so the comments and discussion about the bill went forward. The motion to recommit the bill was one motion upon which we could all agree.

It was suggested that as the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] had been interesting himself in the various parliamentary stages that were transpiring here from time to time, that he be sent for to know what would be the attitude of the Republicans on a motion to recommit. He expressed a preference for the continued consideration of the bill and a daily adjournment. I suggested that that would not meet the purpose I had in view, as I wanted the bill recommitted with the definite purpose of opening up the calendar for such action on other bills as the majority of the Senate might see proper to take. He said he did not know at that time what would be the vote on the Republican side of the Chamber until after some conference with his associates, either general or individually, when he would be better able to inform us of their attitude. In a short time he returned to say that the Republican minority would vote for a motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Commerce. Their vote, added to the seven votes we had, made the number sufficient to carry out that purpose.

It is not my purpose to say that the action of the seven Senators on this side in no way depended upon what the Republicans through the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] indicated a willingness to do. We were thereby advised that we could accomplish our purpose to recommit the bill on a basis of cooperation that we could afford to adopt. I am not disposed to make any denial or concealment of anything connected with this incident that is true. What I have stated is just exactly what occurred. It therefore does not offend me when Senators say that we are supporting the motion to commit as the result of an agreement or understanding with some of the Senators on the other side of the Chamber. But no express or tacit understanding exists for cooperation beyond a vote on the pending motion to recommit.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, inasmuch as the matter has been discussed upon the other side, I think it but fair to state my own attitude toward the bill.

I am very much opposed to the bill, but I am not opposed to the Government buying ships and operating ships in commerce. My objection to the bill lies principally to the intervention of the irresponsible corporation with minority stockholders, the presence of whom, in my opinion, will destroy the effort that is being made.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. May I proceed? I beg pardon.

Mr. REED. I want to say to the Senator—of course I can not interrupt him unless he permits me—but I do hope, if he is going to leave the theme we were on, that he will permit me to ask him a question about it before he leaves it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator from Missouri wish to ask me a question with regard to that?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, I intend to state very briefly my answer to the question heretofore put to me by the Senator from Missouri. Then I shall submit the matter, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. REED. Very well.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senate will remember that at one time the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] introduced a substitute for the shipping bill. Upon the substitute he instantly demanded the yeas and nays. They were ordered upon the spot, and a short while after that the Senator who occupied the chair held, or I understood him to hold, that there could be no amendment presented to the substitute offered by the Senator from Florida. Of course I was interested in presenting my amendment, and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] was interested in presenting his two amendments, for without his two amendments and without the adoption substantially of the substitute which I proposed to offer I was opposed to the bill. I was in deep earnest in securing further action on the part of the committee. I wanted the bill recommitted to the committee in order that it might come from the committee in such form as that amendments could be offered to it if the committee did not itself make those amendments. I asked certain Senators upon this side of the Chamber how they would vote upon a motion to recommit, and they told me. That is all the connection I have had with any conference or with any arrangement with regard to the conduct of the bill.

The Senator from Missouri must be perfectly aware that there is a vast difference between these two things. Assume that all the Democratic Members were present at the caucus—53; that 36 of them vote for the bill and 16 of them vote against the bill; the effect of the rule to which I have referred binds the 16 who have recorded their judgment against the bill to vote for it——

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. Just a moment—whereas if the 53 Senators who were present were each asked how he would vote upon the bill and each one answered truthfully, it would be a conference and might be helpful; it might be beneficial; I do not say that it would not; I believe in the interchange of views and in the expression of views, but the vice appears when we come to a resolution that imposes the judgment of one man upon another and compels him in honor, if he respects his party obligation, to abandon his own conviction and accept that of another man.

Now, Mr. President, I intend to do whatsoever I can here and elsewhere to make it impossible for the members of any political party in any legislative assembly to hold a caucus to determine how the members of the body shall vote upon a particular measure and attempt to bind them to a particular course. I have therefore offered this amendment, which does nothing more than to declare that in cases in which such a caucus has been held and such an order or declaration made, this rule shall not apply; and if in the future there is no such caucus held by either of the political parties, then the rule will be as general in its operation with my amendment as it will be without it. But now is the time and this is the place for those who are opposed to caucus domination upon matters of legislation to attach my amendment to the proposal of the Senator from Nebraska, for if we do I venture to say there never again will be held a caucus in the Capitol that attempts to bind members of a political party to vote for a particular bill.

I close by saying——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator some questions before he closes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, first I want to correct a statement which has been made here so often that it needs correction. The Senator has spoken of 35 Democrats voting for an instruction, and of 16 Democrats voting against it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I said 36.

Mr. REED. Thirty-six for it and sixteen against it.

Mr. CUMMINS. No, Mr. President; I did not say so. I simply presented that spectacle. I did not say that 55 Senators gathered together in this caucus and 36 of them voted one way and 16 the other. I said that that would be the effect of a rule of this sort if observed.

Mr. REED. Well, the Senator then was dealing with a hypothetical case.

Mr. CUMMINS. I said so.

Mr. REED. Of course, the Senator may not know that every man who was at this conference voted for the instruction.

Mr. CUMMINS. No, Mr. President; as I understand, there were in the first place 35——

Mr. REED. I am talking about the final vote.

Mr. CUMMINS. Thirty-five who voted in favor of the bill and three, four, or five against it Then one of the Senators who voted against the instruction or against the bill changed his vote in order that there might be two-thirds, in compliance with the rule of 1903. Then I think the other two or three Members moved to make it unanimous, and there were probably 38, 39, or 40 votes.

Mr. REED. The Senator is misinformed. There was one vote on the roll call against the proposition—not the proposition to bind, but against the proposition—that Senator having said that he was willing to go with his associates, but that he desired to record his vote in order to express his preference, after that was done the action of the conference was made unanimous. It, of course, does not follow that all those who were outside of the conference were against the bill. As a matter of fact they were not.

Now, passing from that, which straightens up the statement of fact, I desire to ask the Senator if he thinks it was any worse for a body of men, all the representatives of a party, to get together in a room, discuss a proposition, and then, if two-thirds of them favor the proposition, for the others to feel bound thereby, than it is for an individual Senator to take the individual pledges of other Senators to stand by him or to stand by some certain proposition?

Mr. CUMMINS. Does that complete the question?

Mr. REED. Yes. Is one any worse in principle than the other?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not believe that any man should pledge himself to vote in any particular way, whether to a caucus or to an individual Senator. I think it is perfectly proper for a Senator to declare to another how he intends to vote upon a particular, a special proposition. In other words, every honest man must keep his mind free to vote as he believes he ought to vote.

Mr. REED. And he ought to maintain that condition of mind up to the time he casts his vote.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know of any circumstance that would alter that.

Mr. REED. Now, is it not a fact that——

Mr. CUMMINS. But that is no defense. Why does the Senator from Missouri desire discussion upon that question of ethics?

Mr. REED. The Senator will get it in my next question.

Mr. CUMMINS. That does not pertain to my amendment. The question here is whether the Senator from Missouri is in favor of a caucus which attempts to bind the members of a political organization to a certain bill or a certain course. If there are other vicious methods prevailing in the Senate Chamber, they can be reached in some other fashion, I am sure, but they are not material here.

Mr. REED. The question here is a choice of procedure. I asked the Senator the question whether he believed that it was right for a Senator to take the pledges of his fellow Senators to support a given proposition. He stated in reply that he thought no Senator should give any pledge or any promise; that he should keep his mind open until the time for voting. I want to ask the Senator if, in and about this very controversy, he has not asked certain Senators how they would vote, and if they have not thereupon stated that they were going to vote a certain way, and if certain of the Senators referred to have not actually gone to him and asked to be released from that arrangement, and if he has not declined to release them?

Mr. CUMMINS. It is not true in any sense. It is true that certain Senators told me how they intended to vote upon the motion to recommit.

Mr. REED. And is it not true——

Mr. CUMMINS. It is not true that Senators have asked me to be relieved from any promise, because they made me no promise or pledge.

Mr. REED. Is it not true that afterwards these certain Senators came to the Senator from Iowa and stated to him in substance and effect that they desired to be released from voting upon certain propositions pertaining to the question of recommitment, or which concerned it, and that the Senator from Iowa said to them in substance and effect they were in honor bound?

Mr. CUMMINS. There is a measure of truth in that.

Mr. REED. Yes. Well, about how much measure now?

Mr. CUMMINS. Well, Mr. President, so far as the Senator from Missouri is concerned he is not my instructor in political ethics. If I were seeking some one to lift me to a higher plane in political life, I would not address myself to the junior Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I decline to yield a moment further. When the Senator from Missouri has so far forgotten himself as to intrude the subject which he has just suggested upon the Senate, I decline to yield for a single moment.

Mr. REED. Very well; I will reply in my own time.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will attempt to declare now to the Senate exactly what happened. I do it with very great reluctance, because it draws into the discussion a matter which ought to be purely personal and which ought not to have been mentioned here at all, and I think the Senator from Missouri has violated all the proprieties between gentlemen in mentioning the subject which he has just introduced.

It is true that when the motion to recommit was proposed I asked certain Senators how they would vote upon the motion to recommit. They knew my interest in it perfectly well, because I had a substitute for the bill, for which I desired consideration; I desired it earnestly and sincerely, and a ruling of the Chair, as I understood, had precluded me from offering it upon the floor of the Senate. I wanted the motion to recommit sustained, because I believed that if the subject were again considered by the Committee on Commerce the view which I entertained would prevail in the committee, and I was trying hard to impress upon my fellow Senators the merit of the proposal that I had laid before the Senate in the form of a substitute. I asked Senators how they would vote on the motion to recommit, and they told me how they would vote on the motion to recommit.

The only other question that ever came up between those Senators and myself was whether a motion to recommit with instructions to report two certain amendments—mine, of course, not included—was consistent with the purposes and the objects of a motion to recommit. I said, and I have no hesitation in saying it again and publicly, now that the Senator from Missouri has made it public, that a motion to recommit with instructions to report forthwith two certain amendments is not the same as a motion to recommit so that the committee could again take the subject under consideration and report according to its view of the whole matter.

The Senator from Missouri has now the entire personal, confidential communication between the Senators whom he had in mind and myself. I want them to understand that I would not have willingly obtruded upon the Senate an intimate, personal matter of this character, and that it has only been drawn from me by the Senator from Missouri in his endeavor to break the force of an argument against the caucus and to divert the attention of the public from the practice of controlling legislation by a secret caucus to the effort upon my part—and upon the part of other Senators, too—to put this bill into such form and in such parliamentary situation as that amendments could be offered to it.

Mr. President, I hope sincerely that the amendment I have proposed will prevail. If it does, I intend to vote for the limitation of debate proposed in the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. If it does not, I shall vote against it, because I will not willingly forego my right to protest on the floor of the Senate against a bill which comes here as the result of a party caucus, accompanied with a binding resolution which compels every member of that organization to support it or suffer a charge of party disloyalty and treason.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Iowa has paid me the compliment of saying that if he desired a political mentor he would not call upon me. Mr. President, I have not been posing as a political mentor for the Senator from Iowa, for the Democratic Party, or for the country, but if I know anything about the history of public matters for the last five or six years the Senator from Iowa has assumed that he is a sort of political Baedeker not only for the Republican Party and for all of its hitherto discordant and disunited elements, but for the country at large. He is now attempting to enlarge the field of his operations so that he may regulate the business of the Democratic Party.

Having succeeded to a large extent in disrupting his own party, by adhering to his favorite doctrine that when he can not control a party he will ruin it, he now crosses the aisle of the Chamber and poses as one entirely capable of managing the business of the Democratic side. He assumes the self-righteous air of a man who is capable of directing the morals and shaping the ethics of everybody else on earth.

If I were inclined to act as guide for others, I surely would not undertake to act as the political mentor for a man who stands here on the floor of the Senate and in one breath denounces the meeting together in a room of all the Members of the Senate who represent a political party, where there is a full and fair and free discussion, where, at least so far as those men are concerned, the question is settled upon its merits, and yet who thinks it is highly proper to have a secret meeting between three or four Senators and to exchange mutual pledges. Who, while he is denouncing public caucuses and public agreements, still insists that it is entirely right to have private agreements and who, when charged with the fact, pleads that it is grossly impolite to even mention the fact that a private agreement had been made.

Let us see where the distinguished Senator stands. The Democrats had a caucus or a conference. Every Member was invited. They came there representing States from all parts of this Union. They had full and fair and free discussion. They agreed to abide by the action of two-thirds. They finally got a vote of all of the Members present in favor of a proposition. They were then merely, as a matter of honor, bound to support that proposition. Any one of them could say he would not obey the caucus vote. If any one of them said it was a matter of conscience with him, he was not required under the rules to obey it. If he said that in his opinion anything required was violative of the Constitution of the United States, he was not bound to obey it. If he said that he had made pledges to his people to the contrary, he was not bound to obey it, and in the last analysis he was not bound to obey it at all except merely as a matter of honor between gentlemen. A record was kept of the proceedings of that caucus. While it is not generally public, it is open to all of those who participate and to all members of the conference. That it is not in any sinister sense secret is shown by the fact that all of the proceedings of the caucus have been exposed here upon this floor freely and without protest. Indeed, the proceedings of our caucuses are generally, in substance, printed in the newspapers.

The Senator condemns that, and says that is wrong, that is wicked. Then the Senator says it is all right for him to get one or two or three or a dozen men together and say to them, "How do you stand?" Of course he did not say to them, "You ought to stand this way" or "You ought to stand that way," or "You ought to stand with me." He just puts it to them, "How do you stand?" They say, "Well, we stand in a certain way." Thereupon days intervene, debate intervenes, motion after motion comes up, and these Senators say to the Senator from Iowa, "We do not think we ought to be bound; we desire to vote differently," and the Senator from Iowa says, "I can not release you from our agreement." The Senator from Iowa says that kind of secret meeting is so sacred a thing that it is wrong even to mention it, ungentlemanly to expose it to the public gaze. Such, sir, is the indefensible position in which the Senator from Iowa finds himself.

Mr. President, one of the great reasons for conferences and party caucuses is to get rid of secret agreements among individual members. It is to substitute party agreement for private agreement; party council for private conspiracy. It is to put the responsibility for public policies upon a political party instead of leaving them to the tender mercies of self-constituted leaders who go about pledging enough men to stand with them so that by private conspiracy they may control the public business.

Why, Mr. President, it is well known that before party conferences came to be recognized that the very cause for the birth of the party conference, the condition of affairs I have described existed. Before the party conference came into being sinister influences were often able to obtain the support of a small coterie of men who, by uniting their votes and throwing them first to one side and then to the other, could control legislation. These gentlemen were merely political pirates, engaged in the business of destroying honest legislation. Albeit, instead of the pirates' black flag bearing the honest skull and crossbones of their trade, they usually fly the milk-white banner of reform, emblazoned with a halo of virtue. Also their motto has been and is independence. Loudly they proclaim that they owe allegiance to nobody and to no party. They are a law unto themselves. They possess all wisdom and all goodness. Under such conditions when the people undertook to determine who was responsible for legislative iniquity it was frequently very hard to fasten that responsibility upon any individual or any political party. Therefore, in order to avoid the evil of secret conferences and private conspiracies between men elected to represent the people, the plan was adopted of bringing all of the members of a party into a room and inducing them there to cast their votes and express their opinions, so that when a man saw fit to organize a coterie of his own he had at least to assume the obloquy of having broken with his party associates. The caucus was intended to abolish the private conference and the private agreement and the private conspiracy in which the Senator from Iowa practically admits he was concerned with reference to this bill.

Mr. President, speaking for myself, I am getting a little tired of this "holier than thou art" proclamation from gentlemen who are engaged in that sort of thing.

One word further. Without intending to provoke any particular discussion or debate, I asked the question this morning whether the Senator from Iowa believed that it was any worse to call the members of a political party in a room, and, after having full and fair council, determining by a two-thirds vote what should be done than it was to get all the members of a political party into a secret agreement or conspiracy and then extending that agreement so as to take in Senators upon the other side so that complete unity of action results? After a good deal of discussion, which has occasioned some acrimony and some avowals that what I charged by my question was untrue, the bald truth is at last made plain, so plain that "the wayfaring man, though a fool, can not err therein." It is this: That a conference or caucus was, in fact, held upon the other side. I do not mean they all got together in a room at one time and by formal action, where there was a chance for mutual expression of opinion, they finally arrived at a determination. What I do say is that an agreement was in fact made, and that is the purpose of a caucus. It is all a caucus can do. Whether the agreement is obtained by going from Member to Member or whether it is done by calling all in a room, whenever you find that a concert of opinion and action has been arranged and agreed upon, whether it is done in one room or a dozen rooms, the result is none the less a conference or a caucus, sir. The place where you do the thing is not important. The particular manner in which you do it is of no concern. The whole question is, Did you do it? And it now stands admitted that an agreement was made upon the other side and that the seven Democrats joined in that agreement.

It also stands admitted that the Senator from Iowa pledged some of his fellow Members—or if he did not actually pledge them he asked them what they were going to do—and then, when the course of conduct was entered upon, he held them to their previous statements, and thus put upon them every coercion that a conference can put upon any man. He put upon them the coercion of their honor, of their agreement, of their binding pledge, which is all any man can give to any conference or any caucus; and yet, pure brain, from his holy lips, from his sacred tongue, comes a denunciation of others who get together in a more open way and in a fairer way and arrive at an agreement!

Woe unto you, scribes, Pharisees, hypocrites!

An attempt has been made during this debate to at least convey the impression that there had been no concerted action on this side among the seven Democrats and no agreement between the seven Democrats and the Republicans.

Again, they did not all get in a room together; but, again, it now stands admitted, that seven Democrats did get together and did arrive at a conclusion, and that a representative of the Republican side met a representative of the seven, and the agreement was then and there made, and it has been religiously adhered to ever since. We have found the seven voting every time with the almost solid Republican side. We have found them voting together upon questions of order even; upon the construction of the rules. They have stood together with a fidelity that would have done credit to a Greek phalanx in the days of Alexander. You could not break the spear of one unless you were able to overcome the entire number.

The only exceptions to this binding rule and agreement on the other side is found in the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], who refused to enter the conspiracy. Outside of them, the agreement has held every Republican fast and firm, immutable and indestructible; and acting with the Republicans, without a variation or the least shadow of turning, have been the seven Democrats on this side. Regretting as much as I do the fact that the agreement was made, regretting as much as I do the fact that seven Democrats were willing to act with the Republicans on the other side, I yet give the allies credit for standing hitched, for keeping their agreement once they had made it. At least, it appears that there is honor among Republicans and Democratic sinners. They do keep their agreements. Let us hear no further denial in this Chamber that there was an agreement, and let all the subterfuges and evasions that have been resorted to now be wiped out, for we now know the fact; it stands admitted and confessed that there was an agreement. An agreement is none the less an agreement if made as was the one at Gerry's celebrated dinner, wherein gentlemen arrived at a gentleman's understanding, or if it be made in a garret between a band of highwaymen who are about to go on a marauding expedition, the conversation being in the lingo of the slums, or whether it be solemnly written down and signed; if there is one mind and one purpose, there is an agreement. It is utterly immaterial whether that agreeement be arrived at in a caucus or in an alley, you arrive in the end at the same thing.

The Senator from Iowa is at this moment a party to such an agreement. It does not lie in his mouth to read lectures to Democrats because they held a conference.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, before I take up the proposed amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], which I expect to oppose, I want to say a few words in regard to the caucus and perhaps the filibuster. I am led to it because of what has been said by the Senator from Iowa and the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. I also desire to do so because the pending amendment of the Senator from Iowa is intended to be a blow at the caucus, and while I shall not support this amendment I am just as much in favor of dealing a blow to the caucus as any man in this body or elsewhere.

In speaking of the caucus and caucus control, Mr. President, I want it distinctly understood that I am not insinuating or attempting to insinuate that because a man believes in caucus rule, and I do not, that I am therefore better than he or that I do not admit the honesty of his purpose and the patriotism of his motives.

I have heard it said many times since I have been in Washington, in the other House and in this, mostly in the other, by great leaders, great statesmen, that this is a Government of parties. I have heard the doctrine promulgated by Mr. Cannon, who was formerly Speaker of the House of Representatives; I have heard this same doctrine promulgated by the present Speaker of the House of Representatives. I hear it here.

Personally, I believe the theory is wrong; but I do not believe that any man has any right or privilege when, believing it is wrong, I condemn it, to say to me that I am putting myself up as a judge of the action of somebody else.

As against party responsibility I believe in individual responsibility. I know there is argument on both sides of the question, and a man has a right to be on either side and still retain his honesty, his patriotism, and, I think, his wisdom. So I am not going to cast any reflection on any man because he believes in a contrary doctrine.

One theory is that we should have two great political parties, and that when we get in a legislative body the members of one side belonging to one party should get together and agree upon a course to be taken in reference to some particular bill, that the other side shall get together and agree what the course of that party shall be, and that a majority or two-thirds, or whatever the rule might be, should decide the course of each one of the political parties.

In my judgment that is wrong. I believe that the American people are beginning to realize that it is wrong. I believe that the progressive spirit of the age is condemning it now and that the caucus will soon be relegated to the past.

If that theory be true, then all a man has got to do if he is in the House of Representatives or the Senate or any other deliberative body is to go to his caucus and do the best he can there to bring about the enactment in the caucus of the legislation which he favors. If he fails, then he supports the bill that he was opposed to or in a form that he is opposed to. If he succeeds, then, of course, he is gratified to know that his party has adopted his ideas.

Mr. President, I want to call your attention to an instance. Several years ago, under the prior administration, the question of reciprocity with Canada was brought up by the President in a special message and a great deal of debate and discussion took place on that law. You will remember that the reciprocity law was passed through the House of Representatives, sent over to the Senate, and failed here because of the expiration of the Congress; that the President called a special session, and that it was put through the House of Representatives the second time, and then again brought to the Senate.

I heard the speech of a noted Member of the House of Representatives who believed in party control and party government and in the submission of the individual to a majority of his political colleagues. I heard his speech made to his constituents after he had gone home at the end of that session. He had made his campaign for election on the theory that he was opposed to reciprocity with Canada. His people were opposed to it. He had denounced it all over his district. But he was a good Democrat. He came to the House of Representatives and his party held a caucus. He went into the caucus. Of course, it was secret. I do not know what happened there. I suppose he did just what he said he did. I have no doubt of it, because he was an honest, upright man. He fought against reciprocity in the caucus, but he was defeated. The Democratic Party in the House decided to stand by the Republican President in favor of Canadian reciprocity, and he voted with his party.

Then he went home, and he made another speech and this is the one I heard or read. He did not dwell much on it. He thought he was justified in the course he took. He assumed that his people would think that way. He said, "I was elected on an antireciprocity platform; I fought it; I denounced it"; and he said, "I carried out the instructions of my constituents. I went down to Washington, and I went into that Democratic caucus, and I did everything I could to defeat reciprocity."

Under one theory of government he had performed his full duty, but when he came to the place where his official action was recorded, he voted just the other way. That is party solidarity. That is party responsibility. That is government by party. That is the submission of the individual judgment to the judgment of his party colleagues.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I suggest that under the rule which applies in the Senate he need not have done anything of the kind; that he would have been released from the rule if he had notified his colleagues.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly. I think the Democratic caucus of the House has the same kind of a rule, but there are men who feel in honor bound to follow the party, and they are men of a high sense of honor. I am not sure but what I honor them for it. At least that is what he did. He followed his party.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HUGHES. It seems to me the Senator must know that the rule is at least equally if not more liberal which prevails in the Democratic caucus than among the Republicans. At the time of which the Senator speaks the terms of the rules were published in the newspapers over and over again. There were a great many at that caucus who for the reason which could have been given by the Representative to whom the Senator has referred declined to be bound by that rule.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly; I understand that.

Mr. HUGHES. A great many of them, I understand, remained in caucus and actually voted on the proposition and then declined to be bound without being held to any responsibility.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes; and I have heard them condemned up one side and down the other until it seems to me a man could hardly stand up under the adverse criticism that was hurled at them.

Mr. HUGHES. It seems to me the Senator has had an unfortunate experience as far as caucuses are concerned.

Mr. NORRIS. I have had lots of it.

Mr. HUGHES. I am willing to admit that there may come a time when the caucus situation on this side of the Chamber may be what it was at one time on the Senator's side, but until that time arrives it seems to me that no general denunciation of caucus rule or of caucus measures ought to be indulged in. So far as I am concerned, my people care little or nothing whether I go into a caucus or not. I doubt if there are a hundred people in my district who are aware whether I have participated in a Democratic caucus, and they will not excuse me for any improvident vote I cast on the ground that I was following the caucus.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator means to say that his people are going to hold him responsible personally for his political action.

Mr. HUGHES. Undoubtedly.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what they ought to do.

Mr. HUGHES. Undoubtedly; and it would be idle for me to go before my people and plead the action of the Democratic caucus.

Mr. NORRIS. If the theory of caucus government is right, the Senator has a right to do that very thing. He can go to his people and say, "I was elected a Democrat, and the caucus of Democrats decided so and so, and I went with them." That is a defense under the caucus system of government.

Mr. HUGHES. Still I was about to state my position on this caucus proposition. I think there has been some change in the public sentiment toward the caucus, because of the manner in which the caucuses on this side of the Chamber at least have been conducted of late. If the Senator could get admission to one of our caucuses, and I do not see that any great harm would come either to the Senator or to our party if he were permitted to attend and listen, if not personally participate, I think his mind would be disabused of a great many erroneous ideas he has with reference to the caucus. I have gone into every Democratic caucus, and I have tried to bring about certain results, and in the final analysis I have always accepted what I have regarded as the best thing that could be gotten from the Democratic caucus.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course it is your duty as a caucus Democrat to get the best you can, and to take what you can get.

Mr. HUGHES. But as to my duty as a Democrat, knowing that this side of the Chamber is charged with the legislation, and it is the only side of the Chamber to which one can look for legislation so long as I am satisfied that the Democratic caucuses are being held, as I firmly believe they are being held now, in the interest of the people of the United States, I propose to participate in them and to submit to their conclusions so long as I do participate in them. The moment that I come to the conclusion that the Senator came to some time ago I shall probably follow the course he followed. When I come to the conclusion that the Democratic caucus is being controlled by outside interests and influences, and not acting for the best interests of the people, I shall probably follow the Senator's course.

Mr. NORRIS. The question of the Senator was so long I have really forgotten the first part of it; but I am not finding fault with the Senator; I am not criticizing him for going into the Democratic caucus if he wants to do so. I think it is wrong. I think I have the privilege to say so, and I am not casting any insinuation on the Senator. He has a right to believe in that kind of government if he wants to, if he believes that is the best way to get good results for the people. I do not believe it, and I have a right to say I do not believe it. Of course the Senator has attended Democratic caucuses where it is claimed it was free and fine, everything lovely, full, fair, free debate and discussion; but he says the caucuses of the other party are controlled by different influences and different interests. In other words——

Mr. HUGHES. I took the Senator's word for that a few moments ago.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, sir; you can get my word for that; but I want to say that the interests or the methods of controlling a caucus are not decided by the political party that is holding the caucus. The same interests that handle a Republican caucus held in secret will get in their work in a Democratic caucus held in secret. You are individuals and human beings the same as other people, no better and no worse. You can not make a caucus good because you call it Democratic and make it bad because you call it by another name.

I know that it is an impossibility to consider a bill of any great magnitude or importance in caucus. Are we elected to caucuses? The law provides, even the Constitution, that on the demand of one-fifth the roll shall be called and every man recorded. Here where we perform the official work that we are sent here to do, have we met fully our obligation to our people and our consciences when we permit our official work to be controlled by the work of a secret caucus?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to his colleague?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have been interested in the colloquy between my colleague and the Senator from New Jersey concerning the caucus. I notice the Senator from New Jersey makes the point that the caucus is an evil thing when it is controlled by outside influences. I want to say to my colleague what I think is generally understood by well-informed people in Washington to-day, that there would have been no Democratic caucus if it had not been for outside influences.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the case nine times out of ten. I am glad my colleague has made the statement. I had no doubt of it. I would rather it would come from him than from me, however.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. But as a rule that is always true, because, to put it down in a nutshell, a caucus is a means by which a minority can control a majority. We have an illustration of it in nearly every caucus that is held.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield, although I hope the Senator will be brief. I do not want to take up the time of the Senate.

Mr. HUGHES. I think the Senator's colleague is mistaken.

Mr. NORRIS. Suppose we let it go at that. I believe he is right.

Mr. HUGHES. I sat in the cloakroom when the matter of calling a caucus was first discussed. I was opposed to it. I did not feel that it was necessary, and I said so; but the order was gotten up and signed in my presence. I think I finally agreed to sign it. The Senator may have information not available to me, but my judgment is that the caucus was not asked for by any outside influence of any kind.

Mr. NORRIS. I suppose the Senator from New Jersey will not try to have us believe that my colleague meant some outside influence made a written command and signed it in writing and sent it by some official to each Senator and told them to get together and hold a caucus.

Mr. HUGHES. No; I mean to say——

Mr. NORRIS. But the methods, the instrumentalities, were provided by the caucus itself. Now, I do not want to get into a debate as to whether your caucus was a good or a bad one or called regularly or anything else. That is nothing to me. I am willing to concede for argument's sake that it was good. The best in my judgment ever held are not fit to legislate. Here is the place to legislate.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Nebraska has made the statement that this caucus never would have been called except for outside influence. That may mean something very sinister. I do not think the question ought to be left in that way.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not mean to say that it is sinister, necessarily; not by any means.

Mr. REED. No; but——

Mr. NORRIS. It might be and it might not be.

Mr. REED. The statement was made by the other Senator from Nebraska that an influence was exerted which, if it had not been exerted, would have resulted in no caucus being called, and the innuendo is left or the inference that that influence may have been sinister. I challenge any man on this floor to name an influence that produced our caucus except the influence of the Members of the Senate who signed the call.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, the Senator——

Mr. REED. I challenge the assertion and I insist that now is the time to speak. You should not rest upon insinuation and innuendo. I challenge an answer to my interrogatory. Now is the time to speak. Let us know the influence, and when and where the influence was put into force. If there is no answer, I have the right to assume that the statement is without warrant. There is no answer.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has not stopped yet to get an answer. There may be one. [Laughter in the galleries.]

Mr. REED. I had stopped twice and I stop now, and I challenge the Senator from Nebraska, who has the floor, to state upon his honor that there was any such influence, and tell how and when it was exerted.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will pardon the Chair before he proceeds. The Chair desires to admonish the occupants of the galleries that under the rules of the Senate any demonstration of approval or disapproval of what transpires on the floor is forbidden. The Chair expresses the hope that the occupants of the galleries, who are there by the courtesy and permission of the Senate, will not again transgress the rule.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I said a while ago I had no disposition to take up any particular caucus. I have no more fault to find with the last caucus that was held than with the one that was held eight years ago. I had yielded, however, to Senators who brought in the last caucus that was held of the Democratic Party, or the caucus on this bill; I do not know whether it was the last one or not. I have said, and I repeat now, I do not believe there would have been a caucus on this bill or a good many other bills if it had not been for influences outside of this Chamber. I repeat now what I said to the Senator from Missouri, that does not mean that the influence was sinister or that it was wrong. It may be proper, if you are going to run the Senate by a caucus, that individuals outside of the body ought to have something to say in the advisory council of the party that is trying to hold the caucus.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, just a matter of correction. The Senator said a good many caucuses had been held. I think I came into the Senate at the same time the Senator did. There have been in three years and over that I have been here just two caucus votes taken. We did not even take a caucus vote on the tariff bill. The other bill, in addition to this one, was a trivial measure. As a matter of fact, the caucus vote was passed as a sort of joke on those who had not seen fit to come. It was some small matter, I have forgotten what it was. So, when the Senator speaks of many caucus votes and many caucus actions, he is not accurate.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator, in the first place, does not quote me accurately. I said there had been many caucuses, and I repeat it. There have been two within the last few weeks. You had a caucus the other night, so Democratic Senators told me, one the day before that——

Mr. REED. We had a conference.

Mr. NORRIS. That was a conference, was it? A rose would smell just as sweet called by any other name. You may call them all conferences if you want to; that is immaterial to me.

Mr. REED. Let me point out the difference to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. I will not yield to the Senator unless he wants to take up time.

Mr. REED. I want to correct the statement and I will make it very brief.

Mr. NORRIS. All right; I do not want to filibuster on this bill.

Mr. REED. The Democratic conference merely discusses the proposition, and is not supposed to bind anybody except as the general course of debate may lead Senators to a conclusion. When two-thirds of the members, however, have voted to make a question a matter of party action it is supposed to bind, with the exceptions that I named some time ago. So when I say to the Senator there have been many conferences, and that there have been but few caucuses, I am stating a distinction that is substantial and not merely chimerical. I do not think that even the Senator or anybody else can object to men getting together in a room and discussing a proposition, which is a Democratic conference.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not even objecting to getting together and discussing it in caucus if gentlemen want to do so. I do not want Senators to continually put me in a false attitude. I do not believe in a caucus on legislative matters. Any Senator who does so believe has a perfect right to his belief, and a perfect right to attend a caucus. I believe caucuses result in bad government. You can not, in my judgment, get as good legislation if you do it through a caucus binding men to vote for what they do not believe in, and keeping out other men because they do not happen to wear the party tag, and preclude them from taking any part in the consideration of the matter you have up. I think it is a good thing for Senators or members of any legislative body to agree on any particular proposition, to get together on a proposition, and agree on a method which they shall adopt to bring about, if possible, the enactment of their views in legislative form.

But what do we have here? We are divided by that aisle, and when a Senator on one side talks with a Senator on the other in relation to a bill he is liable to criticism and to be held up to derision and suspicion. What we ought to have on any measure that comes up here is a meeting, without any political lines, without any partisan division, of those who favor it, and let those who oppose it get together if they so desire. I do not mean now to bind anybody, and I am speaking now of what the Senator from Missouri refers to as conferences. To that I agree. Next time there is a bill or something important up for consideration the same thing could take place, but what would happen if anybody undertook to do that here in the Senate? Because of the partisan feeling that exists and has existed for the years and years that have gone men would almost be ridiculed who would undertake it; and yet you hold a secret caucus, binding men who do not believe in a measure and precluding men who do believe in it even from offering an amendment or their views to be taken into consideration when you come to the enactment of the legislation. That is the evil of the caucus, particularly when it is partisan.

You not only bind men to vote contrary to their convictions, but you really decide upon a bill in secret, excluding Members, probably nearly one-half of the membership of the Legislature, from any participation in it. How often has it occurred when a bill has come in here that by long debate by men who were excluded from the councils of the men who drew the measure, you yourselves were convinced that there was something wrong with it and you took it back into caucus and changed it?

What happened when you brought in one of your great measures that was in your platform—the Trade Commission bill—without any caucus and with no attempt to bind any man? You brought it on the floor of the Senate; you had the active assistance of men on this side of the Chamber to help you shape the bill and to get it into good form. In the form in which you passed it you proclaimed to the country that it was a great achievement and you mentioned it in your campaign book; you talked of it on every stump in the last campaign, and yet some of the most valuable suggestions and amendments and assistance that you got you got from this side of the Chamber.

Why, Mr. President, that illustrates that it is not necessary for any party to go into a secret caucus to frame a bill, and then try to pass it through the assembly without giving members of a different political faith who believe in that kind of legislation the right to be heard and the right to perform the official functions which they are sent here to perform. So it has those two evils.

But, Mr. President, that is not all. The caucus is held in secret. If it is a good thing, then why not have the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD record the proceedings of the caucus? If that is really the institution that does the legislation, then why not take down what is said and done and publish it to the world? It is always claimed that men are not coerced. If they are not, what is the use of a caucus? What good does it do? If you do not attempt to bind men to vote contrary to their convictions——

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WORKS. The Senator from Nebraska has stated that he either knows or assumes that some outside influence brought about the caucus. I should like to ask if he knows or assumes that any particular influence from any particular source was used for that purpose?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; I am not speaking of any caucus in particular. I said as a rule that was true of all caucuses. I said if you were going to run your government on that form, then it would be perfectly proper, in my judgment, for outside influence to come in and ask a caucus.

Mr. WORKS. I should like to ask the Senators, further, if there was outside influence used for such purpose whether it could be other than sinister and improper?

Mr. NORRIS. I think it could. I will take that up. I did not intend to go into it at all until I had been interrupted, but I will answer that question. It is a very proper question. I think such influence could be other than sinister. If caucus control is right, then we ought to always have party solidarity; that is the object of a caucus, to get the members of a party to vote together on everything pertaining to the particular bill about which they are caucusing; to have all vote as a unit. That is for the party. I should say if the Members of the Senate believed in running this body through the mandates of a caucus and the President of the United States belonged to their party, they would consult with him, and very properly he would consult with them. They would consult with the Cabinet officers, and the men who are chairmen of their committees or otherwise high in the councils of the party in control would also be consulted and would have a right to have their views taken into consideration in party control.

If we are going to run our Government by a party caucus, then Members of the legislative body ought to shape their conduct—and when they act through caucus, as a rule they do so—they ought to shape their conduct so as to bring about the greatest possible benefit to that party. That is another objection I have to the caucus. It puts party above country. I am not by that expression intimating that anybody is unpatriotic who believes in a caucus. He thinks that to put his party first is the way to better his country.

Mr. President, I read last night in a paper published in my State a very able article of about two columns describing the Democratic quarrel in the State of Nebraska between the Secretary of State and my colleague here. I thought it was a very fair statement from the editor's standpoint. He went on to give the names of candidates for post offices, for United States marshalships, for the land offices at different places where the terms of the Republican officials had long ago expired but no Democrat had been appointed.

The argument in relation to every case was made in that editorial, and not in a single instance was the question ever raised or anything said about the qualifications of the man to fill the place—not once—but the argument was, "Here is a man who has been a Democrat for 20 years; the Senator from Nebraska has recommended him for this office; and he is held up." Why? Because he did not follow some certain other leader at some other time in the history of the party. It was a question of party entirely, nothing else. The good of the country was not considered by the article, though the writer of the article is one of the ablest editorial writers in the United States and is a high-minded, honorable man; but his enthusiasm over party was so great that the only thing he offered in favor of a man for an office was that he had done good service for the Democratic Party. That is one of the results of partisan control, of party-caucus control, of party government, of party responsibility, instead of individual responsibility.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Did this article discuss the question of the needs of the Postal Service?

Mr. NORRIS. Not once. It discussed the needs of the Democratic Party.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I suppose it did not pretend that the people would get any better service in the post offices if these Democrats were appointed?

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no; but it did contend that the Democratic Party would be better off.

Mr. POINDEXTER. As a matter of fact, it might have discussed the proposition of leaving out both Democrats and Republicans, so far as the postmasters were concerned, and let the post offices run without them. They would run a good deal better in most cases without any postmasters at all, because there is an expert, the assistant postmaster, who is a man who has technical knowledge and who has been promoted up to that place through his experience and his faithfulness in the service, and is paid a reasonable salary. As a rule, the postmaster, who is a politician, appointed through some such controversy as the Senator from Nebraska is describing, knows very little about the workings of the office and pays less attention to it. The chief function that he seems to perform in our political system is being the recipient of a political reward from one party or the other and drawing a salary. Fifteen million dollars a year could be saved to the Government, without impairing the Postal Service at all, by abolishing the office of postmaster altogether.

Mr. NORRIS. That is true; and I want to digress here to say that I am not charging this to the Democratic Party any more than I am to the Republican Party. The system is not right. It all comes about from men putting party too high in the councils of the Government in matters of legislation. It is one of the results of party government and party responsibility rather than individual responsibility and independent action upon the part of every public official.

Mr. President, if we had a legislative body, I will say merely for the purpose of illustration, that contained 100 members, and there were 51 members of one party and 49 members of the other; the party in control gets into caucus; 26 men would be a majority of that caucus, and those 26 men would bind that party, would bind the 51 men, and thus pass the legislation. Where we are divided along party lines and caucus only along party lines, you may have a condition where 26 men out of a hundred are in favor of a bill, all the balance of the hundred being opposed to it, and yet those 26 men would pass that bill. Such a result would be perfectly feasible under the caucus system; and we have hundreds of illustrations where such things have actually taken place, where less than a majority of the body, although a majority of the dominant party, favoring a given proposition have been able to put it through the legislature. It is a very common thing, and is something that happens several times almost every year.

Now, Mr. President, it seems to me that here, in this place, where the law and the Constitution provide that official action shall be taken, every man ought to approach his vote without any strings tied to him and without any coercion from any source.

Something has been said about sinister influences in a caucus. Again I say I am not referring to any particular caucus, but to caucuses in general. Nine times out of ten a party that continually acts by caucus and keeps that practice up will eventually arrive at a stage where fewer men than you can number on the fingers of one hand will control every caucus where they meet in secret.

What would you think, Mr. President, of a caucus of a majority party being held here—it matters not what the party is—with the administration belonging to the same party, and the Postmaster General coming up to the Capitol, buttonholing Members, and saying to them: "I should like to have this" or 'I should like to have that"? He makes no threat; he does not make any demand that is wrong on its face, perhaps, and he does not demand the caucus; but, after he talks with a few of the leaders, a paper commences to circulate; men sign it, and they go into the caucus, and, with closed doors, yes, and locked doors and drawn blinds, laws for the people are enacted, with every man having held up over his head the knowledge that 50 or 100 postmasters that he would like to name may be contingent on the vote he casts. There is no threat made, but Members of the House of Representatives, of the Senate, or of the State legislatures are, as a rule, wise enough, so that they can appreciate what will happen without being told in so many words what the result is going to be.

We know what happens when men are not "good" in their party and fail to yield their convictions. We know what patronage is. I knew it, Mr. President, in my own party; I had it used against me; I know its evils; and yet I am not able to go anywhere and put my finger on any individual and say, "I can prove thus and so in regard to it."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair.) Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. NORRIS. I hope the Senator will not interrupt me just now. Later I will be glad to yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I want to give the Senator a concrete case.

Mr. NORRIS. I prefer not to have it at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska declines to yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I was about to say, Mr. President, when I was interrupted, that I know from my own personal experience what that means; and there is not a Senator here who does not understand it just as well as I do, although he may rise in his place and say, "Point out any particular case." I could point out several; but, as a rule, you only know that such and such a thing has happened. You know what the powers that be want when you go into that secret caucus; you know the man who controls the post offices, and you know what he would like to have you do. He has let you understand it, indirectly perhaps, but you are wise enough to understand, and you know that what you may want to ask for afterwards will depend upon your actions there. That is caucus control; that is party solidarity; that is party government; that is party responsibility. Why, party responsibility means that you will follow your leader anywhere, at any time, in any way. You lose your individuality, and the means to bring that about more often used than any other is the caucus.

Mr. President, I had not intended to take so long a time in discussing the caucus. I desire now to take up the particular amendment which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has offered. In effect it provides that under the proposed rule, if it shall be adopted, no bill upon which a party has caucused can be considered under the rule. That is the intended effect of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. President, it is a difficult matter to draw an amendment that will prohibit the proposed rule from being used when caucuses are held on measures without doing more harm than good, and I believe the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa would be an injury rather than a benefit. Many Republicans have said to me—and the Senator from Iowa recently said it on the floor—that they are in favor of the substitute which I have offered if it could have added to it some such amendment as this, but they are opposed to it unless it has. Their reason is that they wish to take advantage of this opportunity to prohibit the use of the caucus in legislative matters. That is a worthy motive; but I should like to say to them that the caucus is on its last legs. We have seen in the case of this very bill that some of the members of the majority party refused to follow the dictates and the command of a caucus. The evil effects of the caucus system are becoming better known every day, and I believe it will not be long until the caucus will be known only in history. Personally I believe it is a relic of political barbarism. But let us see what would happen under this amendment if it were adopted. It reads:

> This rule shall not apply to any bill, motion, resolution, or question upon which Senators belonging to any political party have held a caucus and passed a resolution or declaration in any form attempting to bind the members of such party in the Senate to vote in any particular way and where the application of the rule is moved by a Senator belonging to any such political party.

Let us suppose now that a bill is pending here and that the majority party caucuses, and that the minority party also hold a caucus, both of them attempting to instruct and to control their members and their votes—and that is the object of a caucus—what would happen if that were done? Who would be qualified to make the motion? Absolutely the entire Senate would be disqualified.

But if it be said by the Senator from Iowa, in defense of his amendment, that there is only one party that will caucus, I say in answer to that that it ought to be framed in such general terms—as his amendment is, of course—so that it would apply to all political parties. We have, however, so far as the consideration of the amendment is concerned, as much right to suppose that one party will hold a caucus as another. Let us suppose, then, that we had a bill here in relation to which one of the parties caucused. Now, any member of that party would be disqualified under the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, if it were adopted, from proposing to consider a bill under the proposed rule. It says——

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NORRIS. Shortly, but not until I finish this sentence. It says that the proposed rule shall not apply—> where the application of the rule is moved by a Senator belonging to any such political party.

So that no one belonging to a political party which had met in caucus would dare make the motion; he could not make it. Now, suppose there were a few Members on the other side who were opposed to having this rule apply to some bill, and they wanted to filibuster, let us say. They could get together and hold a caucus. Under the proposed amendment the caucus does not have to be participated in by all the members of the political party in the body. The amendment provides that the rule shall not apply to questions upon which "Senators belonging to any political party have held a caucus." Suppose half a dozen Members of the other side should get together and pass a resolution solemnly declaring that it was the sense of the members of their party that some bill, whatever it might be, should not be passed, and that "all members of the party are bound by this resolution." Then nobody would be qualified on that side in that party to make the motion. So, if a few Members in each party were opposed to taking up a bill, under this amendment they could take action that would disqualify any Member of the body from making a motion to take it up. Now I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I suppose there is no form of words that can be used upon any subject that is not capable of being misapplied. I think, however, that we ought to look upon this amendment as it relates to matters as they generally transpire. The Senators who desire to prevent a filibuster will be the Senators who will move for the application of this rule. It is not a majority that ordinarily filibusters, but a minority numerically, so that in its ordinary application this motion could only be made by a Senator who belonged to the political party which has held the caucus and which desires that debate shall be brought to an end.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, if a caucus were held, he could not make the motion.

Mr. CUMMINS. No Senator who desired to prolong the debate indefinitely would move for an application of this rule. That would only be done by a Senator who would want debate to be closed. Now, what Senator would want debate to be closed? A Senator belonging to a majority of the Senate and to the party that has held the caucus. In that event the rule would not apply; that is to say, unless it were shown that the caucus had not been held and the order made the rule would not apply. So I can not conceive of how it could practically be misused. While I know that theoretically Senators would divide themselves into groups or knots——

Mr. NORRIS. Who could make the motion now in connection with the shipping bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senators who would make the motion are Senators from the majority.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly.

Mr. CUMMINS. But they could not make it, because they had held a caucus.

Mr. NORRIS. The rule would not apply if it were shown that they had been in caucus.

Mr. CUMMINS. Exactly.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, suppose that I and two or three other Senators should get together on this side and hold a caucus. We could preclude the Senator from Iowa from making the motion, could we not?

Mr. CUMMINS. No; the Senator from Nebraska could make the motion, but the rule could not be made applicable, because a political party had held a caucus upon it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the objections I have offered are not the only ones which can be suggested, although I believe they are valid objections. It only shows how nearly impossible it is to draw a rule that will be workable. Let us see what else would happen under this rule.

How are we going to demonstrate the fact respecting the existence of a caucus? Suppose we had such a rule, and I made a motion to consider a bill under the rule, and the question as to whether or not a caucus had been held was raised. That would have to be determined. This proposed rule is designed to prevent filibustering and delay; but the first thing we run up against is an outside question, the determination of which of itself very naturally means delay. The Senator seeks to meet that contingency. He realizes that it is often a difficult thing to say whether there has been a caucus held or not, as defined in the first part of his amendment. So he adds in his amendment:

> The fact respecting the existence of such caucus, resolution, or declaration shall be determined in the first instance by a committee of five Senators appointed by the presiding officer, who shall report within two days, and upon its report by the Senate without debate.

When the question is raised, this proposed amendment says that the existence of this caucus or the passage of such a resolution must be determined in the first instance by a committee. Well, who will determine it in the second instance? What does that mean?

Mr. CUMMINS. It means the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. I am glad to get the Senator's explanation.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is exactly what it means—in the first place by a committee, and then by the Senate without debate.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, I did not take it that way. It is to be determined in the first instance by a committee, and that committee must report in two days. Why, Mr. President, if such a question were submitted, and an attempt had been made to hold a caucus in violation of the rule, instances would often arise where it would take two weeks for a committee working diligently to determine whether, under the terms of this rule, there had been a caucus. In other words, this rule provides on its very face, it seems to me, its own destruction, and makes it practically unworkable. This committee have to report, it is true, in two days. Whether they are able to report in two days or two weeks depends upon the difficulty of the matter that is before them. It may be easy, and it may be almost impossible to determine.

> Shall report within two days, and upon its report by the Senate without debate.

I hardly get just exactly what that language means, the last line and a half, but I assume it means that when the report comes in it shall be decided without debate. They may ask additional time. The very report on its face may show that they have not gone to the bottom of it. It may show on its very face that they need additional time, and you must either give it to them and get the facts or pass on it without having the facts.

I would not care about the investigation; I would be perfectly willing that that should be made; but you must remember all the time that this is a rule intended to limit debate, intended to bring these interminable and everlasting discussions to some end some time in our lives; and yet we are going to appoint a committee to go outside and make an investigation as to whether a caucus was held and as to whether certain resolutions were passed at that caucus. While it is not provided for here, I think we would have to pass a resolution every time giving them authority to summon witnesses, to compel the attendance of witnesses, and to compel Senators and others to testify. You could not get along without that. At least it would leave it all with the fellows who held the caucus; and while I know that the Senator is acting in the best of faith—I am not questioning that—I take it that if this amendment were adopted it would practically nullify the rules.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does not the Senator from Nebraska feel that if the committee provided for in my amendment should be unable to report, and the matter were then submitted to the Senate without debate, a majority of the Members of the Senate would know whether or not a caucus of this sort had been held?

Mr. NORRIS. Probably; but the Senator knows—he is too good a lawyer not to know—that when you start out to try a lawsuit you may know a whole lot of things that you can not prove, and a great many things that it is very difficult to prove, and a great many other things that it takes a good deal of time to prove. We know about these influences that control caucuses, but a man can get up with perfect safety and say, "I challenge you to cite an instance where, in this particular caucus, anybody used any influence." If you know it, you would not tell it, because you have gotten it confidentially. We know it in this case; it has been announced on the floor of the Senate; but if this rule were adopted, I take it that would not always occur. We would not know, in such a way that we could put it in writing or testify to it, just exactly what resolution they had passed, and hence we would be unable to decide whether there had been such a caucus or such an attempt to control the vote of Members as would disqualify the bill under this rule from being considered under its terms.

Mr. President, I believe that if the substitute I have offered should be enacted into law, there never would arise any difficulty about its enforcement. If men are going to hold caucuses, they will still continue to hold them until they are condemned more strongly than they have been by the people. As I said a while ago, I do not believe it will be long until they will be banished entirely from all legislative bodies. But I would not if I could prevent any man or any set of men from holding a party caucus. I would not take away that right if I could, although if I could get an amendment here—and I believe, in the amendment to the rules that I have offered, I have come nearer to it, though not completely—that would prevent a man who was bound by a caucus from voting to take up a bill under this rule I should be glad to do it. But if you undertake to draw the rule you will find that it is almost an impossibility to do it, and I have reached the conclusion that we must leave it to the honor of each individual and let him decide it for himself; and personally I do not believe we would run any risk if we did it.

For these reasons I shall feel constrained to vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. With the point of view of the Senator from Nebraska I have some sympathy. I believe it would be better for the country if each Member of the Senate of the United States, for himself, upon public questions, and upon honest, sincere argument upon the floor, would determine his vote, so that the action of the Senate would represent in truth the sober, honest judgment of each and every man upon the floor, uninfluenced by any mere party interest or by merely the question of party solidarity or of any undue desire to merely gratify his party associates. But we all know about these agreements, either express or implied, that move either side of the aisle. The Senator from Iowa, of course, can not and will not deny that the word is passed around to get solidarity among the Members on his own side, so that in the votes upon this bill, and even upon the various points of order, there has been the most complete unanimity of the Members on his side of the aisle, trying to get some advantage over the opposing party on this side of the aisle. The Senator wraps himself in a cloak of virtuous indignation when he speaks against the caucus, as if there were, in fact, no caucus upon his side of the aisle, notwithstanding that there is the most complete agreement arrived at with regard to the course of conduct moving the membership on that side of the aisle, and beyond that no caucus can go.

The Senator may say that it is a voluntary agreement. It is voluntary in a certain sense. It is voluntary in the sense that Members on his side of the aisle do not feel willing, when they find a preponderance of opinion favoring a certain course of conduct on that side of the aisle, to go against party colleagues and associates; and therefore, by that procedure having arrived at party solidarity on that side of the aisle, the Senator argues with extreme zeal against any party solidarity on this side of the aisle.

The franker, more open, and more decent method, I think, is to go into a caucus room and there arrive at a party policy, determine what is to the best interests of the country and the best interests of the party, and then and there agree to merge minor personal differences and establish a caucus action and stand firmly by it. In my opinion it will not be many years in this country when we shall have a change from the caucus action, because we will have ultimately in this country a preferential ballot; and when we have a preferential ballot we will do away with minority rule, we will do away with minority nominations, we will do away with minority elections or plurality elections. Then the Members who come to this floor will in fact, and not colorably, represent the majority of the people in the States from which they are accredited. When they do represent the people they will find themselves representing groups of people, representing Democrats, representing other parties that will be allied with them in greater or less degree, and representing ultimately all the people of a State, and feeling that sense of responsibility which will make a Member on this floor in fact and in truth undertake to represent the best interests of all the people of his State and all the people of this great Republic. So long as we have these strongly drawn party lines it is the wisest and the best thing for a party having party responsibility to have a conference of its own members, and in that conference or caucus to work out the personal differences, to argue the matter with perfect freedom among themselves, and arrive at a party conclusion.

Senators continually speak of the party caucus as being a secret party caucus. In fact, there is no secrecy in a party caucus on either side of the Chamber, any more than there is secrecy in the so-called executive sessions, which, under a seal of profound secrecy, are published at great length in the morning papers every day after these sessions are held. More than that, it is a part of the Democratic caucus action that the votes of the members of the caucus shall be given to the press.

I have desired, myself, to have an open party caucus. There is nothing in the party caucus that I would not be willing to make public. I think there is nothing that occurs in a party caucus that is not made public. You can not get half a dozen Senators together and retain anything secret among them. You can not get 53 Senators together and have any hope of secrecy, and to attempt to have it secret is absurd and ridiculous.

Senators talk about a caucus dominating and overwhelming the private individual judgment and controlling men against their will to do this or that. My answer to that is that when I enter into a caucus I find myself sometimes in the majority and sometimes in the minority; something is yielded to my opinions, I yield something to the opinions of others; but when the conclusion is reached I give my voluntary assent and my cordial support to the party action. I do that for the benefit of the party; I do that for the benefit of the legislation, in order to arrive at some adjustment, and in order to prevent a minority on that side of the Chamber entering into a collusive agreement with a small faction on this side of the Chamber, and appropriating the power to conduct the affairs of this Government contrary to the will of the people who put the majority on this side of the Chamber.

It is an old rule of military strategy to divide and conquer. You will not be permitted to divide and conquer the Democratic Party on this side of the Chamber with my consent. There are Members on your side of the Chamber who entertain views with regard to public questions almost identical with my own, yet they rarely find themselves able to break away from their environment, even when they feel strongly upon a question, and vote with those on this side of the Chamber with whom they may be in accord on certain economic questions.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CLAPP. I will tell the Senator why that is not possible. It is because instead of those on that side who are somewhat in harmony with some on this side coming together with them that particular force on that side yields to a caucus, and surrenders—and I do not use that term in any reprehensible sense—that particular conviction which is in harmony with the group here; and that is the trouble with the caucus system.

Take, for instance, the Trade Commission bill, which was worked out in the Senate through an equation. Of all the measures that the Democratic Party will have to its credit in the next campaign, the one measure which no Democrat will have to stand for one moment to defend is the Trade Commission bill, because that, freed from the trammels of a caucus, was worked out upon this floor, and those who did look upon certain public questions alike had the opportunity to come together without any caucus intervening between them and produce a bill which will stand to the credit of the Democratic Party.

Mr. OWEN. There was a considerable measure of sentiment on either side of the Chamber with regard to that measure, and therefore it was possible to deal with it in that way; but where the lines are very sharply drawn it is impossible to do that. The time will come, in my opinion, when that will be the rule, and I hope to see it speedily come. It has not yet altogether arrived.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon another interruption?

Mr. OWEN. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. Take the present shipping bill: There are a number of Senators on that side who are opposed to the corporation feature of that bill. There are a number of Senators on this side who are opposed to the corporation feature of that bill. We believe that it is fundamental; that that feature destroys the Government ownership and control of the ships that it is proposed to build and purchase. If those on that side were as free from the caucus as they were in the case of the Trade Commission bill, those who are opposed to the corporation feature could then come together, and I believe give this country a shipping bill that in the end would redound to the credit of the present administration.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, if the sentiments on that side of the Chamber were altogether like the sentiments of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], I would be opposed to any caucus on this side of the Chamber. Unfortunately that is not the case.

On yesterday the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] made a very elaborate argument on Rule XXII, on the ground that the previous question could not be moved in the Senate of the United States, and on the ground that Rule XXII provides as follows:

> When a question is pending no motion shall be received but—
> (1) To adjourn.
> (2) To adjourn to a day certain, or that when the Senate adjourn it shall be to a day certain.
> (3) To take a recess.
> (4) To proceed to the consideration of executive business.
> (5) To lay on the table.
> (6) To postpone indefinitely.
> (7) To postpone to a day certain.
> (8) To commit.
> (9) To amend.
> Which several motions shall have precedence as they stand arranged; and the motions relating to adjournment, to take a recess, to proceed to the consideration of executive business, to lay on the table, shall be decided without debate.

The Senator argued with great zeal that no motion could be received but the motions which are here enumerated without what he was pleased to designate as revolution, without what he was pleased to declare a destruction and overthrow of the rules of the Senate, on the ground that the words "previous question" had been omitted from this rule in 1806, and that, the Senate being a continuous body, the rules were continuous, and that the rule of 1806 had continued through 108 years up to this day, and that we were still bound by the rule of 1806, and that we could not without revolution change this rule, even by a majority vote of the Senate. The theory that a majority vote of the Senate can not change it is because you can only change it, under the rules, by certain forms, and when you raise the question of changing this rule, that question is itself debatable, and an organized filibuster against it will prevent any change of this rule; and therefore, in effect, that the majority of this body can not change its own rules. He challenges the idea that the rules of the Senate of the Sixty-fourth Congress are not fixed by the rules of the Sixty-third Congress, and insists that the rules of the Sixty-third Congress are made by the rules of the Sixty-second Congress, and so back to the year 1806; and when I ventured to ask him how, in the face of a filibuster which he was taking an active part in conducting on this floor, we might change these rules, the Senator evaded the question in the first place, and when I pressed the question he answered with facetiousness and disappeared behind his own humor. He did not answer the question. He could not answer the question, because, under the right of an organized filibuster a minority can prevent Rule XXII being changed if that rule is, as they contend, not amenable to change by the open action of the Senate.

I should not hesitate one moment in moving the previous question on this floor, and I should expect when it was moved on this floor that the majority of the Senators on this floor would sustain the motion on the ground that common sense and common decency, recognizing the right of the majority to rule this body and to make the rules of this body were involved in that proposition.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BRISTOW. I understood the Senator to say, or my inference was from the Senator's remarks, that he believed that the caucus action should be binding. Was I right in that?

Mr. OWEN. The Senator is diverting me from the argument I am making on the previous question, and I decline to be diverted now. I have already passed from the question of caucus. I will come back to that after I have finished with the previous question, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. BRISTOW. I shall be glad to renew my question at that time.

Mr. OWEN. I shall be very glad to answer the Senator then.

Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senate again to the reason why the Senate of the United States in 1806 omitted the previous question from their printed or written rules. There were only 17 States at that time. There were only 34 Senators at that time—a small group, with a small number of bills before them. The statutes at that time were almost negligible. The various States were connected only by the stagecoach. They had but little in common among themselves. This great country was not then gridironed, as it is now, by hundreds of thousands of miles of steam railroad lines and steamboat lines and connected together by telephone lines to the extent of millions and millions of private telephones, connecting the whole country intimately together. The business of the country at that time was small. These gentlemen—and they were gentlemen—meeting together, had occasion to invoke the previous question only three times in 17 years. Therefore, in recasting the rules, it was regarded by them as being unnecessary to have the previous question, because no man abused the right of freedom of debate. The previous question is necessary only when you have a large legislative body transacting important business, dealing with many public questions of importance, and it is necessary only where men no longer show the reciprocal courtesy which the courtesy or freedom of debate ought to inspire.

The necessity for cloture or the previous question has grown more and more important. It was presented at various times in the past by many distinguished Republicans, as by Mr. Edmunds and Mr. Morrill, of Maine. There are various forms of modified cloture that were suggested by Mr. Windom in 1878, by Mr. Anthony in 1878, by Mr. Allison in 1879, by Mr. Edmunds again in 1882, by Mr. Hale in 1883, upon certain matters; by Mr. Hale again in 1883, and a similar proposal by Mr. Harris in 1884; by Mr. Allison in 1885, by Mr. Frye in 1886, by Mr. Cameron in 1887, by Mr. Edmunds in 1887, by Mr. Chandler in 1890. As the years went on these proposals for cloture grew more and more particular and grew more and more intense. Mr. Chandler, for instance, proposed this:

> Resolved, That the following be adopted as a standing rule of the Senate:
> "Whenever a bill or resolution reported from a committee is under consideration the Senate may, on motion, to be acted on without debate or dilatory motions, order that on a day, not less than six days after the passage of the order, debate shall cease and the Senate proceed to dispose of the bill or resolution; and when said day shall arrive, at 3 o'clock the vote shall be forthwith taken without debate or dilatory motions upon any amendments to the bill or resolution and upon the passage thereof."

Mr. Chandler, I believe, at one time was one of the members of the Cabinet representing the Republicans in the Cabinet, as well as having represented the Republicans on the floor of the Senate Chamber, until he was run over by the Boston & Maine Railroad, an incident of a tragical character which I venture to refer to at this moment, in 1890.

Mr. CLAPP. May I ask the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. CLAPP. Is it not a fact that when that Senator was urging that rule he was for the steam-roller method to rule the minority in the Senate?

Mr. OWEN. Oh, Mr. President, I can not answer whether the Senator was or was not a member of the steam roller. The majority always tries to exercise its authority. If it does not do so, it ought to be kicked out of authority and become a minority, as it deserves to be. A majority that has not intelligence enough or enough virility to exercise control ought to be made a minority; it does not deserve to rule if it has not enough manhood to exercise the power.

Mr. CLAPP. That is true; but it turns out that the group of which the Senator at that time was a part, while nominally a majority, was not in fact a majority of the Senate.

Mr. OWEN. I shall not undertake to analyze that relationship, because it is not before me and would divert me from the presentation of the Republican authority which I am now offering on the previous question.

In 1898, August 1, Mr. Blair, quite a distinguished Republican Senator, submitted the following resolution, which was ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be instructed to report a rule within four days providing for the incorporation of the previous question or some method for limiting and closing debate in the parliamentary procedure of the Senate.

Mr. Blair did not do that without some cause. Doubtless he felt that a majority party in control of the Senate ought to be allowed to exercise the powers given to them by the people of the United States, and Mr. Blair was right about it. But these various Republican authorities that I have cited are not all. Here comes in Senator Hoar, a distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, August 9, 1890, and submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Rules and ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That the rules of the Senate be amended by adding as follows:

"When any bill or resolution shall have been under consideration for a reasonable time it shall be in order for any Senator to demand that debate thereon be closed. If such demand be seconded by a majority of the Senators present, the question shall forthwith be taken thereon without further debate, and the pending measure shall take precedence of all other business whatever. If the Senate shall decide to close debate, the question shall be put upon the pending amendments, upon amendments of which notice shall then be given, and upon the measure in its successive stages, according to the rules of the Senate, but without further debate, except that every Senator who may desire shall be permitted to speak upon the measure not more than once and not exceeding 30 minutes.

"After such demand shall have been made by any Senator, no other motion shall be in order until the same shall have been voted upon by the Senate, unless the same shall fail to be seconded.

"After the Senate shall have decided to close debate, no motion shall be in order but a motion to adjourn or to take a recess, when such motion shall be seconded by a majority of the Senate. When either of said motions shall have been lost, or shall have failed of a second, it shall not be in order to renew the same until one Senator shall have spoken upon the pending measure or one vote on the same shall have intervened."

That was not all. On the 12th of August, 1890, Mr. Edmunds—and Mr. Edmunds is regarded also as a man of sound mind, a man learned in the law, learned in parliamentary practice, a man of very great intellectual distinction—proposed the following order:

Ordered, That during the consideration of House bill 9416, entitled "An act to reduce the revenue and equalize duties on imports, and for other purposes," no Senator shall speak more than once, and not longer than five minutes, on or in respect of any one item in said bill, etc.

All appeals pending the matter aforesaid shall be determined at once, and without debate.

Mr. Blair, August 12, 1890, submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the following rule be adopted to fix the limit of debate, namely:

"RULE —. When a proposition has been under debate two days and not less than four hours, which shall be determined by the Presiding Officer without debate, it shall be in order to move the previous question, unless the Senate shall otherwise fix the time when debate shall cease and the vote be taken; and in any case arising under this rule the Senator in charge of the measure shall have one hour in which to close the debate.

"During the last 14 days preceding the time fixed by law or by concurrent resolution passed by the Senate for the end of the session, a majority of the Senate may close the debate at any time, subject to the right of the Senator in charge of the measure; and any motion for the previous question, or to limit debate and to fix the time for the vote to be taken, shall cease in one hour and be subject to the Anthony rule."

On August 12, 1890, Mr. Quay, then a Senator from the State of Pennsylvania, submitted the following resolution for consideration, which was ordered to be printed:

Resolved, That during the present session of Congress the Senate will not take up for consideration any legislative business other than the pending bill (the tariff bill) and general appropriation bills, bills relating to public buildings and public lands, and Senate or concurrent resolutions.

Resolved, That the consideration of all bills other than such as are mentioned in the foregoing resolution is hereby postponed until the session of Congress to be held on the first Monday in December, 1890.

Resolved, That the vote on the pending bill and all amendments thereto shall be taken on the 30th day of August instant at 2 o'clock p. m., the voting to continue without further debate until the consideration of the bill and the amendments is completed.

On August 16, 1890, Mr. Quay again made a proposal for the limitation of debate:

Ordered, 1. That during the present session of Congress the Senate will not take up for consideration any legislative business other than the pending bill (H. R. 9416), conference reports, general appropriation bills, pension bills, bills relating to the public lands, to the United States courts, to the Postal Service, to agriculture and forestry, to public buildings, and Senate or concurrent resolutions.

Ordered, 2. That the consideration of all bills other than such as are mentioned in the foregoing order is hereby postponed until the session of Congress to be held on the first Monday of December, 1890.

Ordered, 3. That a vote shall be taken on the bill (H. R. 9416) now under consideration in the Senate and upon amendments then pending, without further debate, on the 30th day of August, 1890, the voting to commence at 2 o'clock p. m. on said day and continue on that and subsequent days, to the exclusion of all other business, until the bill and pending amendments are finally disposed of.

And that it was proposed to modify, for the foregoing stated purpose, the following rules, namely: VII, VIII, IX, X, XII, XIX, XXII, XXVII, XXVIII, XXXV, and XL.

Ordered, That the notice, with the proposed orders, be printed.

The purpose of that was to put an end to the debate on the tariff bill.

On August 18, 1890, Mr. Quay urged a similar rule for the purpose of limiting debate on the tariff bill.

On December 23, 1890, Mr. Aldrich, long recognized as the leader of the Republican Party—gave notice, in accordance with the provisions of Rule XL, that he would move certain amendments to the rules, which would modify Rules VII, VIII, IX, X, XII, XIX, XXII, XXVII, XXXV, and XL, and for that purpose he would hereafter submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That for the remainder of this session the rules of the Senate be amended by adding thereto the following:

"When any bill, resolution, or other question shall have been under consideration for a reasonable time it shall be in order for any Senator to demand that debate thereon be closed. On such demand no debate shall be in order, and pending such demand no other motion, except one motion to adjourn, shall be made. If such demand be seconded by a majority of the Senators present, the question shall forthwith be taken thereon without debate. If the Senate shall decide to close debate on the bill, resolution, or other question, the measure shall take precedence of all other business whatever, and the question shall be put upon the amendments, if any, then pending, and upon the measure in its successive stages, according to the rules of the Senate, but without further debate, except that every Senator who may desire shall be permitted to speak upon the measure, including all amendments, not more than once, and not exceeding 30 minutes.

"After the Senate shall have decided to close debate as herein provided, no motion shall be in order but a motion to adjourn or to take a recess when such motion shall be seconded by a majority of the Senate. When either of said motions shall have been lost, or shall have failed of a second, it shall not be in order to renew the same until one Senator shall have spoken upon the pending measure, or one vote upon the same shall have intervened.

"Pending proceedings under the foregoing rule no proceeding in respect of a quorum shall be in order until it shall have appeared on a division or on the taking of the yeas and nays that a quorum is not present and voting.

"Pending proceedings under the foregoing rule, all questions of order, whether on appeal or otherwise, shall be decided without debate, and no obstructive or dilatory motion or proceeding of any kind shall be in order.

"For the foregoing stated purposes the following rules, namely, VII, VIII, IX, XII, XIX, XXII, XXVII, XXVIII, XXXV, and XL, are modified."

Ordered, That the proposed resolution be printed.

On December 29, 1890, Mr. Aldrich, pursuant to notice given on the 23d, submitted a resolution, which was ordered printed in the form which I have just presented to the Senate.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator has shown several attempts to amend the rules of the Senate so as to limit debate, beginning, I think, as early as 1872.

Mr. OWEN. As early as 1841.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Very well, since 1841. Have any of those attempts been successful?

Mr. OWEN. Oh, no. Oh, no minority filibuster can defeat them.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. At any rate, the Senate has gone along since 1841——

Mr. OWEN. Yes; under the rule of the minority filibuster.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. About 70 years, and the Senate has not amended the rule in this respect?

Mr. OWEN. Not yet.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Not yet.

Mr. OWEN. But it is about to amend it now.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Although there have been a great many attempts to do it.

Mr. OWEN. They are going to be amended now.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator says so, but I would rather have the Senator's view as a historian than his view as a prophet now.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator will have both.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think his view as a historian will differ from that as a prophet when we get through.

I was going to ask the Senator whether he does not think the failure of the Senate for 70 years to make this amendment is entitled to greater weight in considering this question now than the futile attempt of a Senator now and then during the course of 70 years to make the amendment?

Mr. OWEN. Oh, Mr. President, under the interpretation of the rules by the Senator from Utah, who, I take it, is in strict accord with the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], they having had a caucus, you can not amend the rules. Under their view the rules of 1806 are perpetual and can never be changed so long as a vigorous minority objects.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. It occurs to me the mere fact that Senators for 100 years neglected to do what was their duty in order to cut off interminable debate ought hardly be pleaded now as a justification for further neglect along that line.

Mr. OWEN. There was quite a vigorous effort made on the part of Senator Aldrich and the Senators behind him to modify these rules. I shall not go into the debate except to point out that it will be found in the debates of 1891, beginning in January, where vote after vote was taken and where a filibuster was organized by the Democrats against a change of the rules.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. I wish to ask the Senator if he is filibustering?

Mr. OWEN. Oh, no, Mr. President; I am simply making a few observations on the need of changing the rules and putting an end to filibustering. I am merely occupying the floor that would be otherwise occupied by the filibusterers. [Laughter and applause in the galleries.]

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator from Oklahoma yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma will please suspend. Under the rules of the Senate the occupants of the galleries are not permitted to give any expression of their approval or disapproval of any remarks made by a Senator.

Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator from Oklahoma tell us what he is reading from?

Mr. OWEN. He is reading from the RECORD of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is, the Senator is reading from his own speech?

Mr. OWEN. I am reading from the abstract from the RECORD made by the legislative reference bureau under my instruction.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Which the Senator put in the other day?

Mr. OWEN. And which it is impossible to make the Senator from Utah give attention to unless by reading it to him in person. For that reason he is reading it to him in person.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I ask the Senator whether it is the same matter he read the other day?

Mr. OWEN. No; it was not read. It was inserted in the RECORD. I am now reading it, and I am reading it in order to bring it to the attention of the Senate and the country, and I will do it on more than one occasion until the country realizes what is being done to public business by the filibuster on the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. WEEKS and Mr. LIPPITT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. If the Senator is anxious to have an audience, I think he should have it. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I submit that no Senator can rise in the time of another Senator and make any such suggestion as that.

Mr. OWEN. I make the point of order that the Senator from Massachusetts is out of order; that I did not yield to him for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFCER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. OWEN. For a question.

Mr. LIPPITT. I was only going to ask the Senator whether he would kindly tell us about how long he intends to continue to read these interesting articles, that I might make my plans accordingly.

Mr. OWEN. I should say about 20 minutes.

Mr. LIPPITT. Thank you.

Mr. OWEN. I have no purpose to hold the floor longer than to emphasize the Republican authority which I have in favor of cloture or the previous question or the limitation of debate in this body.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Is it not a fact, I will ask the Senator, that not one of the proposed amendments or orders ever was passed or became a part of the rules of this body?

Mr. OWEN. I have already said to the Senator that a minority filibuster can prevent the modification of the rules, if his interpretation of the rule prevails, and therefore I say that his interpretation of the rules is unreasonable and absurd and self-contradictory if majority rule is to control this body.

No; they have not been adopted, because a robust minority prevented the majority from establishing a change of the rule, and I do not care whether the minority was Democratic or not. It is both a Democratic principle and a Republican principle in this country that a majority shall rule, and when Democrats on this side assert minority rule, and when Republicans on that side assert minority rule, I think the origin does not dignify the argument. The argument stands independent of the authority—that the majority has a right to rule. I am in favor of exercising that right, and I am in favor of doing it now, not to-morrow.

Mr. GALLINGER, of New Hampshire, on the 14th of October, 1893, on page 2504, made this proposal:

When any bill or resolution reported from a standing or select committee is under consideration, if a majority of the entire membership of the Senate submit a request in writing, through the Chair, that debate close, such papers shall be referred to the Committee on Rules, and it shall be the duty of said committee within a period not exceeding five days from the date of said reference to report an order naming a day and hour when a vote shall be taken, and action upon said report shall be had without amendment or debate.

Senator HOAR made a similar proposal to this effect in 1893, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 1637:

Resolved, That the rules of the Senate be amended by adding the following:

"When any bill or resolution shall have been under consideration for more than one day it shall be in order for any Senator to demand that debate thereon be closed. If such demand be seconded by a majority of the Senators present, the question shall forthwith be taken thereon without further debate, and the pending measure shall take precedence of all other business whatever."

And so forth.

Senator HOAR, Senator GALLINGER, Senator LODGE, Senator Platt, and Senator ROOT, all of them are on record for limiting debate. Here is a resolution proposed by Senator Orville H. Platt, of Connecticut, introduced September 21, 1893, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 1636:

Whenever any bill or resolution is pending before the Senate as unfinished business the Presiding Officer shall, upon the written request of a majority of the Senators, fix a day and hour, and notify the Senate thereof, when general debate shall cease thereon, which time shall not be less than five days from the submission of such request, and he shall also fix a subsequent day and hour, and notify the Senate thereof, when the vote shall be taken on the bill or resolution and any amendment thereto without further debate, the time for taking the vote to be not more than two days later than the time when general debate is to cease, and in the interval between the closing of general debate and the taking of the vote no Senator shall speak more than five minutes nor more than once upon the same proposition.

Senator VEST, of Missouri, in 1893 introduced the following resolution, the most moderate form of terminating so-called debate:

Amendment intended to be proposed to the rules of the Senate, namely, add to Rule I the following section:

"SEC. 2. Whenever any bill, motion, or resolution is pending before the Senate as unfinished business and the same shall have been debated on divers days, amounting in all to 30, it shall be in order for any Senator to move that a time be fixed for the taking of a vote upon such bill, motion, or resolution, and such motion shall not be amendable or debatable, but shall be immediately put."

And so forth.

Now, Mr. President, Senator ROOT, on the 6th of April, 1911, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be, and it is hereby, instructed to report for the consideration of the Senate a rule or rules to secure more effective control by the Senate over its procedure, and especially over its procedure upon conference reports and upon bills which have been passed by the House and have been favorably reported in the Senate. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 47, pt. 1, p. 107.)

I have quoted these very distinguished Republican leaders in order to call the attention of the country to the fact that Senator Root, Senator Gallinger, Senator Lodge, Senator Orville H. Platt, Senator Quay, Senator Edmunds, and the various Senators whose names I have quoted have demanded the right of the limitation of debate in this body; and therefore, since it has been demanded in this way by the leaders on that side of the Chamber and the leaders on this side of the Chamber, under the broad ground that the majority has a right to rule in this body, no further argument is necessary. Even under the unanimous consent of the Senate the change of the rule ought to be recognized. Indeed, I think no change of the rule is necessary. The only thing which is necessary is to carry out these rules in the spirit of the rules. The only thing necessary is to recognize the constitutional right of one-fifth of the Members of this body to demand the yeas and nays upon any question pending, and no sophistry, no intellectual quibbling or crafty argument, can abate the force of that language of the Constitution of the United States, which says that "the yeas and nays," being ordered by "one-fifth of those present," shall be "entered on the Journal." You can not enter them on the Journal without taking the vote. That constitutional right carries with it the right to take a vote at the time it is demanded and not at some future, delayed, or refused time. It is refused by an organized filibuster—organized not with a caucus, perhaps, but, what is worse than a caucus, without even debate among themselves. They meet in the cloakroom and check up man by man to conduct an organized filibuster, so that every step is known to every man in the filibuster. It is an organized conspiracy against the sovereign power of the people of this Republic, denying them the right to rule, denying them the right to speak and to make effective their will through the majority of their chosen representatives in this body.

Mr. President, I shall from time to time submit some further observations upon the question of the limitation of debate in this body and on the previous question. I now move to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, and I demand the yeas and nays on that proposal.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma moves to lay on the table the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. The Senator from Iowa suggests the absence of a quorum, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fletcher	Martin, Va.	Shively
Bankhead	Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ariz.
Brady	Goff	Nelson	Smith, Ga.
Brandegee	Gore	Norris	Smith, Md.
Bristow	Gronna	O'Gorman	Smith, Mich.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], on account of illness.

Mr. RANSDELL. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON], on account of sickness. He is paired for the day until 6 o'clock with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-four Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] has moved to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. REED. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. RANSDELL (when Mr. THORNTON's name was called). I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] on account of illness. He is paired until 6 o'clock this evening with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 45, nays 47, as follows:

YEAS—45.

Ashurst	Lea, Tenn.	Ransdell	Smith, S. C.

NOT VOTING—4.

Chamberlain	Oliver	Sterling	Thornton

So the Senate refused to lay the amendment of Mr. CUMMINS on the table.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. LIPPITT. I yield for a question only.

Mr. GORE. I will say to the Senator from Rhode Island that I desire to ask unanimous consent to report the Agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. LIPPITT. If I can yield to the Senator for that purpose without losing the floor, Mr. President, I shall be glad to yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator may do so by unanimous consent. The Chair hears no objection.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. GORE, from the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 20415) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 987) thereon.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, a few days ago the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], in discussing the then existing situation in the Senate, caused by the Republican opposition to the shipping bill, said that extraordinary conditions demanded extraordinary remedies. He was considering the subject from the standpoint of what might justly be done to remedy what he regarded as an extraordinary condition.

I want to consider that situation, not viewed from the standpoint that it was an extraordinary condition but from the standpoint that what was occurring then was in itself an extraordinary remedy, for the extraordinary condition, to my mind, existed prior to that situation, and the dramatic events that were occurring here were in themselves an extraordinary remedy for unwise and unjustifiable attempts to conduct the business of this body in extraordinary and unusual ways.

The Congress of the United States, and the Senate in particular, may reasonably be regarded as a piece of legislative machinery; machinery that, within the limits of what it is designed for and is capable of performing, is efficient and works with creditable satisfaction; but, like all machines, if asked to put through a larger output than it was designed for, if run at a higher speed than it is intended for, it begins to creak and groan and show signs of distress. The gears grind and the belts slip. What has been undertaken in connection with the legislation of this session is to put through the senatorial machine a larger volume of business than it is possible to properly consider, formulate, and enact into law in the necessarily limited period of time of a session which expires by law on the 4th of next March.

Primarily, the business of this session of Congress is to pass appropriation bills. This in itself is a very great and a very important undertaking. It is one to which more time should be given than is frequently the case. The records of past Congresses, I think, show conclusively that these great appropriation bills are often neglected; that they have generally failed to receive the amount of consideration in this body that their importance entitles them to. That is particularly the case during these alternate terms of Congress, which are known as the short sessions, beginning on the first Monday of December and expiring, necessarily on the 4th day of the succeeding March. It has often happened—I think the records will show it has usually happened that the consideration of these appropriation bills gets pushed over to the last few days of such sessions. Other subjects are taken up in the first days of these sessions; the Senate becomes interested in them; they open up wider fields for discussion than was at first expected, perhaps, and by the time they have finally been disposed of the remaining time is so short that in the natural desire of Senators to finish the business of the session and in the necessity that exists for the disposal of these subjects in some way they are rushed through an impatient Senate more inclined to hasten their passage than to analyze their details. That they are important I think nobody will be disposed to deny. The Government of the United States is a great business organization. Even in these modern days of great commercial undertakings it is the largest business organization in this country. I presume it is the largest business organization in the world. Its annual income and outgo are now considerably more than a billion dollars a year, and the regular appropriation bills of this session, I understand, will provide for even a larger total expenditure than that enormous sum.

The first necessity of every business management is to provide for the prompt and orderly management of its finances. Obligations that are due under the customs of business at fixed times have to be met at that time. Failure to do so results in trouble and disaster. And what is true of private business is also true of governmental business. Sitting as a board of directors of the United States this body has no more important duty than to carefully supervise and provide for its financial arrangements. Extravagance, waste, and inefficiency mean a burden upon the people. In the magnitude and complexity of governmental administration they may not be aware of the causes that produce it. They may not fully appreciate the situation or perhaps locate the blame, but the duty exists, nevertheless, in this body to give this important subject complete, ample, and unhurried consideration. That necessarily can not be done when in a short session, such as the one we are now in the midst, other important and fundamental subjects of legislation are allowed to push the subject of finances into the crowded days at the end of a strictly limited session.

When the attempt, therefore, is made, as it has been made in this session of Congress, to interfere with the necessary and legitimate work of the session by introducing other important subjects of legislation the extraordinary situation arises here which occurs when any machine is pushed beyond its reasonable and proper limits. That is the extraordinary situation in which we find ourselves to-day. There has been an attempt to enact at this short session of Congress more legislation than could be properly and efficiently debated and considered in the time at its disposal.

Because of this desire to push the congressional machine beyond its limit of production, to run it at a higher rate of speed than it was capable of going and do good work, the parliamentary machinery has become clogged. It is perhaps an unprecedented situation. Taking all the circumstances of it together, I presume there has been no occasion in the history of the Senate when a greater strain has been put upon its machinery.

That the situation may be understood, that the reasons and the causes which have produced it may at least be known, and such weight as those causes are entitled to as a justification or otherwise may be given them, I want to review the steps that have led up to our present situation.

It can not be denied that the shipping bill is an important measure. It is important on account of the large sum of money—$40,000,000—which is directly involved at the start of the project with which it is concerned, and of the still larger sum which in all human probability will be involved if the project is ever put into operation. How much larger that sum may be nobody has undertaken to estimate, so far as I know, but that additional sums will be required, and large sums, I have also not heard denied, and I presume nobody will undertake to deny it.

The bill is also important because it starts the Government on a new field of activity and because that field involves the principle of Government ownership instead of Government regulation of industrial affairs, a principle that, under the growing pressure of modern industrial development, is daily becoming more insistent and whose revolutionary possibilities, as regards social and business relations, are so great that to take any action upon it without due and careful consideration, without a full understanding of the nature of that step and the future possibilities of what it is committing us to, would be an unforgivable negligence of duty on the part of every legislator involved in the transaction. A measure of this character, so far-reaching in its possibilities, is entitled to be presented to this body with at least as complete a statement of the exact nature of the proposed project, with at least as voluminous testimony of men's judgment in regard to its operation, and to be debated by both its advocates and its antagonists at least as fully as is customary with other measures of similar importance in this body.

One of the causes of the extraordinary condition in which we now find ourselves is that these conditions have not been fulfilled. The course of this bill has been hurried from its beginning up to the present moment, or, at least, it has been attempted to be hurried, but like many other things that are undertaken without careful preparation, without thorough understanding, the lack of time given to preparation has resulted in delay and waste of time instead of progress.

It is customary when an important measure is to be considered by Congress to gather together in convenient form special information in regard to it. Such information is necessary for the intelligent consideration of new projects. Members of Congress have not all the information in the world at their finger ends. They are not experts in every direction and on every subject. But what they do have to guide them in becoming at least well informed, if not expert, is the machinery for getting together the information necessary for their guidance. The usual way of obtaining and making available in concentrated form such necessary information is through the instrumentality of hearings. At such hearings men who are experts, who have the information, are brought to testify. They are subjected to examination, and their statements are questioned, so that doubtful points can be cleared up, obscure or incomplete testimony can be made plain, and by the use of the information derived from such hearings it is possible for Congress to form opinions with at least some plausible ground for supposing them to be correct. On this bill this important and usual course was practically omitted. No hearings at all were held upon this bill by any committee of this body. The only hearing that has been held was by the House committee that had a shipping bill under consideration, and that hearing was of the very briefest description. No expert in this complicated and diversified and far-reaching business of shipping appeared at all. The entire testimony that was given occupied not more than four or five hours and covers but 48 printed pages. To show how different this is from the ordinary proceedings let me compare it with the hearings that were held upon some of the other subjects that have been legislated upon during this Congress.

The Panama tolls bill was taken up for consideration. On that bill the hearings that were held occupied 1,022 pages of testimony. An important bill revising the banking and currency law of the country was being considered. Testimony was taken upon that subject by the Senate committee in 1913 occupying 3,200 pages. The Federal Trade Commission bill was considered and passed by this body. Hearings were held upon that subject in 1914 occupying 1,538 pages, and this was in addition to the fact that under a special provision of the Senate the Senate Committee on Interstate Commerce had two years before, in 1912, on what was substantially the same subject, spent a large part of a winter in taking testimony which in its completed form occupied 2,500 pages. On the tariff bill, which was taken up for consideration in 1913, there were 6,345 pages of hearings. And yet, in spite of what has been the usual custom, as indicated by this list, on this equally important shipping bill the entire testimony that was taken occupied but 48 pages.

If the domain of this measure had simply involved the broad question of Government ownership, such lack of information would be unusual and, I think, inexcusable. Nevertheless it might be of less importance, because Government ownership as a principle has been much thought of and much discussed of late years and has necessarily been a matter for reflection on the part of every man in public life. There is much literature on the subject. But dealing with an emergency, as this measure is supposed to do, manifestly there was an unusual necessity that the nature and the extent of that emergency should be clearly stated and defined and that information as to the effect of this proposed remedy should be gathered from whatever reliable sources were available. Instead of that we have this bill presented with none of that information except such as might drift into the way of Senators through casual news items or stray editorials in the daily press. Manifestly none of the ordinary sources of information could supply the facts of an emergency of a character unprecedented in history, and the result was, and is, that it has been left to the diligence of individual Senators to gather together such information as they could without official assistance from any source.

Now, what was attempted to be done in the Senate with this bill? The business of the Senate during this session has been taken up so far with the consideration and passage of three measures in addition to this shipping bill. Congress met on the 7th of December, and on the 9th of December the immigration bill was made the unfinished business of the Senate and continued to be debated and to occupy the time and consideration of the Senate until it was passed on the 2d day of January. Two days before that, on December 31, the urgent deficiency bill, appropriating $4,398,000, had been reported to the Senate, and immediately after the completion of the immigration bill it was taken up and was passed on January 6. Two days before that, on Monday, January 4, this shipping bill was reported to the Senate and made the unfinished business, but was laid aside to complete the consideration of the urgent deficiency bill. On the 7th day of January, the day following the passage of the urgent deficiency bill, this shipping bill was again laid aside for the consideration of the District of Columbia bill, appropriating some $12,000,000, one-half of which, $6,000,000, was to be paid by the National Government. The consideration of that bill and of the national prohibition constitutional amendment, which was injected into it, lasted until January 18. So that for practically the first six weeks of the session the Senate was engaged in considering the subjects of immigration and of prohibition and in passing two appropriation bills, the total amount of money involved in which was a trifle over $10,000,000. About one-half of that time was devoted to the consideration of the appropriation of this comparatively small sum of money out of a total of over a billion dollars that the Government will have to appropriate at this session if it completes the work ordinarily performed at this time.

If that three weeks was properly needed for the discussion and consideration of these two small appropriation bills, it would naturally seem that the balance of the session would have been none too short a time to devote to the consideration of bills appropriating the enormous additional sums that are needed to run the Government, without interjecting into the discussion and into that consideration any other great and important subject upon which the Senate was sure to differ and whose importance was sufficient to justify a careful consideration and a general debate. That, however, was not the course that was decided upon by the majority party. But on January 18, after the passage of the District of Columbia appropriation bill, this shipping bill was again made the unfinished business. The previous history of the bill in the Senate had been this:

On December 9 it was introduced by Senator STONE.

On December 16 it was reported with amendments.

On December 31 a majority report was filed.

On January 4 a minority report was filed.

On January 4 it was made the unfinished business of the Senate.

On January 6 the Committee on Commerce reported a substitute for the original bill.

On January 7 the consideration of the bill was laid aside for the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

On Monday, January 18, the shipping bill was finally taken up as the main business of the Senate.

During the following week, from January 18 until Friday at 20 minutes past 4, the bill was kept continuously before the Senate. The Senate met each morning at the unusual hour of 11 o'clock, and the sessions lasted as follows: Monday, until 6.17; Tuesday, until 6.16; Wednesday, until 6.25; Thursday, until 6; Friday, until 20 minues past 4.

In all, the Senate was in session for 29 hours and 30 minutes, and during those 29½ hours not one single speech was made by any Member of this body in favor of this measure. What did occur, if the current reports around this body are true, and I have no doubt they are, was that every evening during that week the Democratic Senators, or a large proportion of them, were engaged in a secret caucus of whose proceedings the Senators on this side of the body had no knowledge; were holding meetings for the purpose of preparing a bill they could finally support; and the cause of the adjournment of Congress on Friday of that week and its not sitting on Saturday was for the purpose of enabling that caucus to have further secret consideration of this bill during that day and to try to arrive at some definite agreement upon the form of a bill that would be accepted as a party measure.

Nevertheless, in spite of the fact that this bill was being secretly considered in this way for the purpose of perfecting it, there was constantly laid upon the Republican Members of this body the task of occupying the whole of that 29½ hours with continuous discussion of the bill, under the threat that if their discussion ceased even for a minute the bill, even in its imperfect form, would be promptly passed by the majority.

On Monday, January 25, as a result of the previous week's secret caucus action, a new substitute for the bill, the second that had been presented, was reported by the Committee on Commerce as the form in which the majority then proposed to enact this measure into law, and although there had been up to that time, with the exception of a single short speech by the Senator in charge of this bill, the Senator from Florida, no presentation of it from the Democratic side, the attempt to rush the bill through the Senate without debate was further continued. During the following week, beginning on Monday, January 25, the Senate met at 11 and adjourned at 6; on Tuesday, January 26, the Senate met at 11 and recessed at 5.52: on Wednesday, January 27, the Senate met at 11 and recessed at 9; on Thursday, January 28, the Senate met at 11 and recessed at 10.15; and on Friday, January 29, having met at 11 o'clock, an attempt was made to keep the Senate in continuous session until it should have passed this bill, and as a result of that unusual proceeding the Senate did remain in session all Friday night and until 11.15 Saturday night, a total of 67 hours for that week, or for those two weeks that the bill had been before the Senate a total of 96½ hours. And during that 96½ hours only one single speech was made in favor of this bill by any of the Democratic advocates of it, that speech being one occupying some two hours, made by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] on one of the legal aspects of the bill, the question of the international relations that might be involved in the purchase of ships from belligerent nations.

In other words, what this record shows is that for the two weeks of this short session prior to midnight on Saturday, January 30, an attempt had been made to force through this Senate a bill that had been presented to it by the party responsible for its creation without providing any adequate information for its consideration, the construction of which had been three times radically changed as the result of secret consideration of its provisions—and I might add that it has been changed since that time—and practically without making any adequate attempt to debate or explain or defend on the floor of the Senate either its original provisions or its subsequent changes, a proceeding which I believe was absolutely indefensible, which is unworthy of any responsible legislative body, which I think is unparalleled in the history of the Senate, and which if it should become customary would inevitably destroy the usefulness of this body.

This attempt to speed up the legislative machinery far beyond its capacity of efficient performance, as is well known, was accompanied by constant declarations of the purpose on the part of the majority that in using these extraordinary methods they intended to enact this legislation into law, not by an attempt to convince its opponents of the propriety and justness of its provisions, but by the power of the physical weight of a majority sitting by in a conspiracy of silence, waiting for the physical exhaustion of their opponents.

If this proposed bill had been a thoroughly digested measure at the beginning, presented as a result of a thorough consideration of the ends it was designed to accomplish, complete in all its parts to accomplish its purpose, and meeting carefully formed views of its advocates, though the proceedings would have been revolutionary as compared with the ordinary practice of this body, perhaps the men who adopted them might have found in these facts an excuse for their course; but the changes that this bill has gone through since it was taken up for consideration by this body on January 18 until to-day is ample evidence that no such thing was the case. For scarcely had the bill been brought before the Senate on January 4 than it was almost immediately—on January 6—followed by a substitute bill from the committee having it in charge. On January 25, as the result of a week of Democratic caucus, although there had been no public debate upon it at all from the Democratic side, a second substitute was introduced, and to-day, as the result of still further private consideration, some of the provisions of that second substitute have been withdrawn and a new substitute, known as the Gore amendment, containing provisions not in either of the previous forms of the bill, has been presented to the Senate as the last form in which this silent Democratic team propose to enact their captain's bill.

Now, certainly nothing can be more unwise in a country governed as is ours than hasty and ill-considered action on important subjects by its legislative bodies. I think I am well within the bounds when I say that far too much of that inevitably takes place. There is a strong and growing conviction that a large part of our present commercial troubles are the result of such proceedings. We do not hear many complaints these days of too few laws being passed. We do hear many complaints, and from the most responsible sources of too many laws being passed. The distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] in a recent address pointed out that in the five years from 1909 to 1913, Congress had passed 2,013 statutes and other lawmaking bodies in this country had passed 60,000 statutes. So that the excuse for speeding up the legislative machinery on this bill can not be defended on the ground that we are suffering from a lack of lawmaking.

By long-established custom this body has become the sole tribunal in which national legislation can be given the ripe and mature consideration necessary to avoid costly mistakes. As every Member of it knows, we do enact in the course of a session many bills, some of them of very considerable importance, without long consideration or lengthy debate. But they almost invariably deal with subjects upon which the convictions of Senators are thoroughly established and where those convictions are in substantial accord. But when this is not the case and the importance of proposed projects justifies consideration, reasonable time for debate must be allowed as well for the protection of the responsible majority against insidious errors as for the welfare of the country, and the adoption of this course has repeatedly vindicated itself.

What, then, is a reasonable time for the consideration of such a fundamental and far-reaching measure as the one under consideration? Take the Panama Canal tolls amendment of last year as an example. It was received in the Senate and referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals on April 1. It was under consideration by that committee for a month, until the 30th day of April, during which time hearings were held covering 1,022 pages. It was reported to the Senate on that day, and two days later, on the 2d of May, was made the unfinished business by the Senate, and so continued until it was passed on the 11th of June. For 40 days that bill was before this body, and the debate that occurred upon it was of such a high order and so illuminating as to various phases of the subject that I doubt if many thoughtful people would be willing to say that it was unnecessarily extended. Nevertheless the total amount involved in that bill was only some $2,000,000 annually, as against the $40,000,000 initial expenditure of this shipping bill, and the fundamental principle involved in it was certainly not more far-reaching than the fundamental principle in this measure.

The Federal Trade Commission bill of last year was originally introduced on January 24, a substitute was reported on June 6, and on June 25 it was made the unfinished business. Forty-one days later, on August 5, it passed this body. I can not conceive that anyone would believe that that bill to establish machinery among other things, for regulating monopoly was any more important or fundamental than this bill, which proposes to establish a monopoly, and that, too, the most pernicious form of monopoly, because, while an ordinary business monopoly can be regulated or controlled by the Government, from the exactions of a Government monopoly there is usually no practicable appeal.

If, then, in the case of these two recent bills, a consideration of nearly seven weeks each was justified, there can be no justification for attempting to force this bill through the Senate in the way the majority have undertaken to do. If this amount of time, as the RECORD shows, was taken for consideration of these bills, the question naturally arises, Why is the attempt being made to curtail the consideration of this shipping bill? The reason is very plain, for the fact is that in the limited time of this session it would be utterly impossible to give this shipping bill the usual consideration that is given bills of such importance, and also to give to the appropriation bills the reasonable and proper consideration that they are entitled to.

If, therefore, an extra session of Congress was to be avoided and all of this legislation was to be accomplished, it was absolutely necessary that one portion or another of it should not have proper consideration, and the trouble that has arisen in connection with this matter is entirely due, I think, to this attempt to force upon Congress more legislation than it could legitimately undertake in the time at its disposal. If this shipping bill had been presented in the customary way, if there had been no attempt to prevent a reasonable and full discussion of its provisions, with reasonable time allowed for the consideration and digestion of the circumstances that discussion might develop, which is the only way any bill can be properly considered by this body or any other, I do not believe that anything like the present situation would have arisen here. Other measures have been presented here by this Democratic majority, to the principles and details of which the Republicans were opposed, without there being any suggestion of any extraordinary measures of opposition, and if this bill had been allowed by its advocates to take the ordinary course I do not believe it would have excited any extraordinary opposition. But that has not been the case. It has not been presented here in the ordinary way in which such measures are presented.

From the very beginning of its active consideration an attempt was made to establish a practical cloture—to limit discussion, to avoid debate. The Senate was kept in session unusual hours, and every minute of the time the opponents of the bill had to exercise constant watchfulness lest in an unwary moment they were caught off their guard and a vote be taken. Speakers had to be ready to follow each other in unbroken succession, unusual parliamentary devices had to be resorted to. Was this because the debate had been unusually extended? Can anybody pretend that a shipping bill ought to have been passed during that first week of its consideration, when the form of bill for which its advocates would finally stand had not even been agreed upon, much less presented for consideration? Yet it was under the well-understood threat of such a step that the Republicans carried on their discussion of the general subject during that entire week. I say of the general subject, for no one knew what the exact bill was to be, not even the Democrats themselves. That remained for the secret deliberations of the caucus to decide, influenced by considerations that were not made public, and yet it was the business of the public that was being discussed.

And then the second week began. And on that second Monday what then was supposed to be the final form of the bill was laid before the Senate—the first notice that the Senate, as a whole, had of its details. Was it then proposed that time should be permitted for a full and free and fair consideration and discussion? Not at all. The same threat, but intensified, was in the air. There was no doubt about it here on the floor or in the cloakroom. It was reflected in the press and on the street. And to carry out the undenied purpose of the majority the Senate was kept in session on Wednesday till 9 o'clock, on Thursday till 10.15, all night on Friday, and, without interruption, until 11.15 Saturday evening. And how were these long hours spent? Were they for the purpose of enabling the advocates of this new measure to explain and defend the policies and the purposes and the changes of this bill? Not at all. Practically all of the time had to be used up in some way by the bill's opponents, or this unexplained, undefended bill was to pass. The majority believed they could pass it before that Saturday evening came to a close, and they meant to do it. The gallery yonder was filled with their wives and daughters come to see the triumph of their cause. And it was not the cogency of their arguments they were relying upon to accomplish this result, for they had made none, but upon the physical exhaustion of their opponents.

But this un-American form of argument did not succeed. It ought not to succeed. Men came from their sick beds to risk their lives to oppose it. Men of advanced age, in their seventies, willingly faced the strain upon their health and strength to keep the vigil of those long night hours to see that it did not succeed. And younger men skilled in debate, equipped for such a struggle through long years spent in the study of public questions, took up the burden of discussion. And then what happened? Why, the un-American policy of silence and secrecy and physical exhaustion failed, but the thoroughly American policy of frank and full publicity and discussion did not fail. It succeeded, for scarcely had the next week opened when seven of the ablest among the Democrats declared their intention to oppose this measure. The habit of free and full debate that for more than a century has been the custom of this body vindicated itself. It has been said that oratory never changed a vote. I do not know whether those long two weeks of continuous speeches changed these votes, but if they had not been made the opportunity for the convictions of these courageous and conscientous Senators to become crystallized would not have existed.

What are the purposes of these debates here in the Senate? What is the justification of them? There are two principal ones. The effect they will have on the opinions and the votes of the Senators themselves. We have seen that this debate was not without results in that direction. And then the effect they will have on the opinions and votes of the people outside of this Chamber, and to give time and opportunity for those outside opinions to be reflected back here again. This can not happen in a day or a week. The American people, thank God, are usually busy with their own concerns, but they expect us to conduct ours with the same patience and wisdom and thoroughness that they give to their own. But when they find us in doubt and the opportunity is given them, the weight of their opinions usually finds a way to manifest itself. It comes through the press, whose general policy is to mirror that opinion. It comes through the declarations of public and semipublic organizations. It comes through private correspondence. It seems as though the weight of that opinion to-day is against this measure. But perhaps it has not yet had the time to be definitely formed, or at least to convincingly express itself. Senators may doubt the final form it will take.

But of the situation here there is no doubt. It is a tie. Practically the Senate is equally divided, at least so far as votes are concerned. So far as the personal convictions of Senators are concerned it is not a tie. It is against the bill. And if it is a tie as regards the actual votes in the population those votes represent it is not a tie. I have here a table showing the population of those States whose Senators are united in favor of this bill, of those States whose Senators are against the bill, of those States whose Senators are divided on the question. I will not read it, but without objection I will ask permission to have it printed as part of my remarks. I presume the Senators have a fairly good idea of the opinion of the people of the States they represent on this subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is so ordered.

Mr. LIPPITT. What that table shows is that the 18 States where the Senators are a unit against the bill have a population of 36,314,023 people; that the 17 States whose Senators are a unit in favor of the passage of this bill represent 27,891,487 people. If this is any guide to the sentiment of the people, it shows that there are 33 per cent more against the bill than there are in favor of it.

What, then, ought to be done with this bill if its consideration is to be continued? I think it ought to be dropped, anyway for the time being, and the appropriation bills taken up. But if it is to be continued, what then is the right policy to be adopted under the conditions as they exist? Manifestly, to continue the discussion in a fair and patient and temperate and customary manner. To let both sides present their arguments on this actual measure, have amendments made and considered on their merits here on the floor of the Senate, and decided here, not in a caucus, whether secret or open, so that whatever is done will be the record of the majority of the Senate and not of two-thirds of a secret society. Probably we would then arrive at a decision sooner or later—and there is no hurry about it—that will represent the best opinion and the final wish of America. Perhaps we would find a compromise that even if it did not suit the extremist on either side, might be satisfactory to moderate-minded people. And then, when the discussion had run its course, whether in this session or an extra one, do as this body has done on hundreds of other questions, great and small, in the past, take a vote and settle this question in accordance with the mature convictions of the Senate, convictions formed here as the result of consideration and not under coercion from any source. Then the Senate and its ways will be justified to itself and the country.

But what is it that it is proposed to do? Violate and ignore the rules established for the orderly conduct of the meetings of this body on the one hand, destroy them by the ruthless hands of arbitrary power if that power can be assembled and bound for the purpose, override them against such protest as the minority can make, put the vote and declare it carried if a majority of even a single vote can be found to cast it. Or establish a cloture rule to cut off debate on the pretense that debate has been too extended. Why, there has not been a single hour of free and untrammeled debate on this bill yet. And even if the time that has elapsed since the bill in its completed form was laid before the Senate on January 25 by some freak of the imagination is to be assumed to have been spent in proper debate, then it is but three weeks that have been so spent, when six and seven weeks have been spent in the consideration of no more important bills without a suggestion from either side of the Chamber or from the country that such time was wasted. On the contrary, it has been repeatedly recognized by many students of congressional procedure that these debates had materially improved the measures they were directed to. Such an editorial was in last night's Washington Star, and no doubt hundreds of them could be collected from important papers all over the country. What then would be the purpose and result of such a rule passed in opposition to the century-old experience of the Senate? Why, simply to make easier in the future the task of an impatient majority that was willing to substitute the policy of physical exhaustion of the minority, as has been attempted on this occasion, for the method of meeting it in fair discussion.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Rhode Island yield for a question?

Mr. LIPPITT. I yield for a question.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senator from Rhode Island has, as have several other Senators in this discussion, referred to the Democratic claim that the majority have been prevented from voting on this measure. Is it not a fact that practically on every test vote which has come near the heart of this question there has been shown an exact division of the two sides of the Chamber, and that it has required the vote of the Vice President to decide many of the questions? So, instead of speaking of the majority, is it not better to say that, when the Senate is equally divided on this question, one-half of the Senate is asked to surrender to the other half and to allow the Vice President to cast the deciding vote? Half of the Senators are opposed to this bill, as practically every record vote has disclosed. I have no doubt the Senator from Rhode Island has observed this fact.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, the question which the Senator from Michigan asks is certainly very pertinent. In the previous part of my address I had referred to the situation of the Senate being that of a tie, and suggested that the only proper method to pursue in regard to this bill was to continue the debate until we could arrive at some conclusion. I think what the Senator says about the Senate's being in a tie and neither side having a majority is absolutely correct.

We know the explanation of all this. We know that this is a measure that the President of the United States, as a team captain, had decided upon. We know that it was being pushed without the approval of a very considerable number of the Democrats of this body. We know that even of those who now support it that it is not deep conviction that animates them, but the assumed necessity of party loyalty. We have a record in the presumptious, and I think I am justified in saying the impertinent, threat which the President of the United States indulged in in his speech at Indianapolis toward the Republican Members of this body which shows the arbitrary temper with which the administration were dealing with this subject at that time. If the President was in such a state of mind then that he could characterize the Republicans of this body, from whom he would naturally expect criticism, as misguided or blind or ignorant, and challenge them to show their right to oppose his measure, what he would think or do or say to opposition in his own party I think may well be left to the imagination.

These, then, are the extraordinary conditions that have surrounded the attempt to pass this bill. Their adoption led to the use of extraordinary methods to meet them. Those methods have been called a filibuster. Perhaps that name is as useful as any. Justification for the things itself exists in the indefensible character of the methods to which it has been opposed. If the Republicans have apparently accepted the challenge to talk this bill to death, it is because the Democrats have failed to perform their duty of talking it into life. The bill has been brought in here like a vagrant waif from the city slums, nameless, half fed, half clothed, and defenseless, its merits, if it has any, unrecognizable from neglect and abuse. The situation here is certainly extraordinary. I am told by those who have been long in this body that nothing like it has occurred for 20 years, since the early nineties, when the protest in regard to silver legislation took this form, and when on another occasion, at about that same period, the able representatives from the South of the State rights doctrine—a doctrine which the representatives from the same communities to-day have apparently forgotten—used this same weapon of filibustering to protect a theory which they believed was vital to their existence.

In another way this occasion is extraordinary. It is extraordinary because the resentment on this side of the Chamber against the methods that have been adopted for the passage of this bill is so strong and because the conviction on this side of the Chamber in regard to the unwisdom of the measure itself is so great that for the first time in four years there exists here a practically united opposition to the policies of those who sit on the other side of the aisle. With but a single exception, the Senators on this side of the Chamber, whether conservative or progressive, are a unit in opposing this product of a combination between the secret caucus and the presidential prerogative. And not only has this extraordinary procedure in connection with this bill caused these extraordinary remedies to be adopted, but another extraordinary remedy of even deeper significance has been forced into action, for seven of the ablest Democratic Members of this body have felt obliged to temporarily break their allegiance to party policy and throw the great weight of their influence against this bill and the methods being used in its favor. I say seven of the ablest Democrats, for I venture to say that it would be impossible to get together from the Democratic side of this Chamber another seven men who would stand higher than those seven in the judgment of their associates. I do not mean to say that there are not other Democratic Senators who are not highly esteemed by all the Members of this body. I do not mean to say that there are not other individual Democratic Senators who are not as highly esteemed as any of these seven; but I do say that there is no group of Senators on that side whose character and ability is held in any higher estimation. They not only stand high individually, but what they represent is suggestive. It is not a revolt caused by any sectional feeling. The East and the West and the South have in that seven some of their ablest representatives. The importance of the communities that they represent, in numbers and in high character, is suggestive. The life-long affiliations of these Senators with Democracy is suggestive. Men of this type do not lightly break their party ties. They do not hastily or without the incentive of deep convictions put themselves in opposition to a party policy. They all of them understand the strength that comes from union. They, as much as anyone, realize the necessity of some subordination of personal belief to the convictions of a majority. That the extraordinary circumstances, then, attending this measure have brought into existence this most extraordinary remedy is in itself the severest condemnation that can be conceived of those methods themselves.

Within the last two or three days there have been several propositions introduced by the more radical supporters of this bill looking to help its passage by the establishment of some kind of a cloture, and the authors of them in some cases have urged in favor of them, and not without heat, the necessity of the majority of the Senate being able to register its will. Let me say again to the gentlemen who think such changes are necessary that the result of the Republican discussion of this bill, which you can call a filibuster if you wish, has absolutely vindicated itself in the situation which exists here to-day. This discussion and consideration, one sided as it has been, has already forced change after change to be made and remade from the original bill that was laid before this body. It has produced the extraordinary revolt that has occurred in the Democratic ranks and it has established the fact in the consciousness of every Member here that if this bill could be voted upon in such a way that each Senator should record his individual convictions, free from the coercion of party machinery, there would be an ample majority against it.

I believe the procedure that has been adopted in favor of this bill is absolutely indefensible, and whatever action I have been impelled to take in opposition to it I have taken not alone because my convictions are against the wisdom of the measure, but as a protest against these revolutionary practices which, if persisted in, I believe will inevitably destroy the usefulness of the Senate. The Senate can not be useful unless it is independent. There has been a growing tendency toward domination by the Executive over this body. It did not originate with the present administration. But, in spite of the very positive preelection declarations of Mr. Wilson in regard to publicity and openness in the conduct of governmental business, he has not merely adopted the policy of Executive domination that some of his predecessors had attempted but he has gone far beyond it, and in this particular instance the attempt has been made not merely to compel the adoption of his particular views on this subject, but also to compel their adoption without the usual opportunity for the discussion and consideration of those measures.

The break in the Democratic ranks has enabled us to know something of the inside caucus history of this bill. We know now by the declarations on this floor of men who participated in these secret meetings something of what occurred there. That there was opposition there was easily inferred from the fact that it took a whole long week of repeated conferences to arrive at a decision. But we know now that, while the rules under which that secret organization compelled its decisions to be registered on this floor by the votes of its members was through the drastic use of a two-thirds vote, binding the entire membership, in this case so strong was the opposition that out of the 53 Senators comprising its membership, when the vote was taken upon the approval of the bill, there were only 35 Democrats who voted in favor of it, that being 1 less than the two-thirds necessary to bind the entire membership, and therefore it was necessary, in order to get the majority necessary for the despotic dictates of the caucus to operate, to persuade one of the Senators opposed to the measure to change his vote. This was done, by what inducements has not yet been revealed, and so the final vote which set all this machinery going was the bare 36 votes, without which it could not be put in force at all.

We know now that, as this situation stands, the attempt is being made to put this bill through this body because 35 Democratic Senators out of a total of the 96 Members in this body perhaps believed in it. That may be modern Democratic doctrine, but it is not the rule of the majority as it is understood by the American people, and it is not a method of transacting business that will enable the Senate of the United States to retain the confidence of the people.

I believe there is but one proper proceeding that should now be taken by this body, and that is to proceed to the consideration of the proper business of this session, the consideration and passage of as many as possible of the appropriation bills. Even if we undertake that at once and use all the time there is at the disposal of Congress before the 4th of March, we shall, even then, be obliged to give too little rather than too much time to the consideration of the very important subject of national finance. But the consideration of that subject is the legitimate and proper business of this session, and it ought not to be neglected.

If when that is done the President of the United States thinks the enactment of legislation on this shipping question is of such importance that it justifies the calling of Congress together in extra session, I for one have no objection at all to that session being called. And if, after a reasonable and proper time has been given to the discussion of a shipping bill under those circumstances, free from the extraordinary attempt that has been made at the present session to throttle debate, and free from any attempt to introduce a practical cloture by trying to physically exhaust the opponents of the measure—if then a majority of this body, influenced by their convictions instead of a caucus gag, decide that they want to pass this shipping bill or something like it, I believe there will be no unusual objection made to it by the Republican Members of this body. But under the conditions that I have attempted to describe, and by the methods that have been adopted, this bill ought not to pass; and if, through any parliamentary manipulation, it is forced through at this session as a result of this two-thirds caucus gag rule, itself instigated by what I consider an improper use of the presidential prerogative, the Senate will have taken a long step toward destroying its prestige and its usefulness.

Among the departments of the Government, this Senate is the citadel of free speech. It is the only forum where the great principles of government and the rights and liberties of the people can be freely and exhaustively debated and discussed. It is not a new thing to have that prerogative of this body challenged by ambitious and obstinate Executives, carried away by enthusiasm for their own ideas and impatient at opposition to their plans.

The character of the present Executive as it has day by day unfolded itself seems to point to as determined an effort in that direction as has ever been made. We begin to see the basis for the generally accepted belief that the trustees of Princeton University, fearful of the effects of the domineering disposition of Mr. Wilson upon the future of that institution, were not displeased when he left them for other activities. We begin to see why the rugged honesty and sturdy independence of Grover Cleveland forced him to break away from his connection with that university.

The significance of President Wilson's laudation of President Jackson at Indianapolis is given a deeper meaning by the events that have rapidly followed each other since that speech was made. The most determined attack that was ever made upon those rights and prerogatives that are essential to this body if it is properly to perform its duties and continue to occupy an important place in the function of government occurred under Jackson's administration. I do not know of any better way to set forth the larger meaning and the possibilities of the present situation than to quote the language in which Daniel Webster discussed this same question of the Senate's duties and powers at that time. In the Senate, on May 7, 1834, Senator Webster used the language which, without objection, Mr. President, I ask to have printed as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Every encroachment, great or small, is important enough to awaken the attention of those who are intrusted with the preservation of a constitutional government. We are not to wait till great public mischiefs come, till the Government is overthrown, or liberty itself put into extreme jeopardy. We should not be worthy sons of our fathers were we so to regard great questions affecting the general freedom. Those fathers accomplished the Revolution on a strict question of principle. The Parliament of Great Britain asserted a right to tax the Colonies in all cases whatsoever, and it was precisely on this question that they made the Revolution turn. The amount of taxation was trifling, but the claim itself was inconsistent with liberty; and that was, in their eyes, enough. It was against the recital of an act of Parliament rather than against any suffering under its enactments that they took up arms. They went to war against a preamble. They fought seven years against a declaration. They poured out their treasures and their blood like water in a contest against an assertion which those less sagacious and not so well schooled in the principles of civil liberty would have regarded as barren phraseology or mere parade of words. They saw in the claim of the British Parliament a seminal principle of mischief, the germ of unjust power; they detected it, dragged it forth from underneath its plausible disguises, struck at it; nor did it elude either their steady eye or their well-directed blow till they had extirpated and destroyed it, to the smallest fiber. On this question of principle, while actual suffering was yet afar off, they raised their flag against a power to which, for purposes of foreign conquest and subjugation, Rome, in the height of her glory, is not to be compared; a power which has dotted over the surface of the whole globe with her possessions and military posts, whose morning drumbeat, following the sun and keeping company with the hours, circles the earth with one continuous and unbroken strain of the martial airs of England.

The necessity of holding strictly to the principle upon which free governments are constructed, and to those precise lines which fix the partitions of power between different branches, is as plain if not as cogent as that of resisting, as our fathers did, the strides of the parent country against the rights of the Colonies, because, whether the power which exceeds its just limits be foreign or domestic, whether it be the encroachment of all branches on the rights of the people, or that of one branch on the rights of others, in either case the balanced and well-adjusted machinery of free government is disturbed, and, if the derangement go on, the whole system must fall.

Mr. President, the contest for ages has been to rescue liberty from the grasp of executive power. Whoever has engaged in her sacred cause, from the days of the downfall of those great aristocracies which had stood between the King and the people to the time of our own independence has struggled for the accomplishment of that single object. On the long list of the champions of human freedom there is not one name dimmed by the reproach of advocating the extension of executive authority; on the contrary, the uniform and steady purpose of all such champions has been to limit and restrain it.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, at other times in the history of the Government more or less vigorous attempts have been made to sweep away senatorial opposition to presidential plans. They have not succeeded because heretofore they have always been vigorously and successfully resisted. As this present attempt is being made by Democrats, perhaps it will not be amiss to quote the language in which one of the great Democrats of the last century expressed his opinion upon this subject. In the speech which Stephen A. Douglas made at Alton, Ill., on the 15th of October, 1858, he spoke as follows:

I hold that an attempt to control the Senate on the part of the Executive is subversive of the principles of our Constitution. The Executive department is independent of the Senate, and the Senate is independent of the President. In matters of legislation the President has a veto on the action of the Senate, and in appointments and treaties the Senate has a veto on the President. He has no more right to tell me how I shall vote on his appointments than I have to tell him whether he shall veto or approve a bill that the Senate has passed. Whenever you recognize the right of the Executive to say to a Senator, "Do this or I will take off the heads of your friends," you convert this Government from a Republic into a despotism. Whenever you recognize the right of a President to say to a Member of Congress, "Vote as I tell you or I will bring a power to bear against you at home which will crush you," you destroy the independence of the Representative and convert him into a tool of Executive power. I resisted this invasion of the constitutional rights of a Senator and I intend to resist it as long as I have a voice to speak or a vote to give.

The particular method which is now relied upon to destroy the independence and the importance which has adhered to this Senate from the beginning, and which Webster so eloquently defended, is the two-thirds rule of the Democratic caucus. Probably no more efficient instrument could be devised for that purpose, if it can be established and maintained in practice. If the entire vote of a party can be absolutely bound by such a device, if all the independent and courageous men on the other side of the Chamber can be brought into subjection in this way, it makes the task of an ambitious and forceful Executive comparatively easy.

Such a rule, while obnoxious under any circumstances in such a body as this, is perhaps not of so great importance while a party is in a minority, but as an instrument of legislation in a majority party, its effect upon the importance of the Senate in legislation must be swift and deadly. This rule was adopted, as it has recently developed, in 1903, and one of the very earliest attempts at its enforcement occasioned a determined revolt from its tyranny on the part of one of the Democratic Senators of that day, against whose right of independent action it was invoked. I want to read the language in which Mr. Patterson, then Senator from Colorado, expressed his disapproval of it.

Without objection, Mr. President, I will not read this, but I will ask that it be inserted as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. Patterson on the 5th instant, as follows:

"Whereas the Constitution of the United States provides that 'the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the legislatures thereof,' and that 'each Senator shall have one vote'; and

"Whereas each Senator, before assuming the duties of his office, is required to solemnly swear or affirm that he 'will support and defend the Constitution of the United States, and that he will faithfully discharge the duties of the office upon which he is about to enter'; and

"Whereas, because it was currently reported that one or more Democratic Senators might vote upon certain matters pending before the Senate contrary to the view of a majority of the body of Democratic Senators, the Democratic Senators were called to caucus upon such matters; and

"Whereas it was found at such caucus that said reports were correct, and that certain Democratic Senators might or would vote contrary to the views of said majority; and

"Whereas thereupon the following resolutions were presented and adopted by more than two-thirds of the Senators present at said caucus:

"'Resolved, That the Senate ought not to advise and consent to the treaty between the United States and the Republic of Santo Domingo, now pending before the Senate.

"'Resolved, That if two-thirds of this caucus shall vote in favor of the foregoing resolution it shall be the duty of every Democratic Senator to vote against the ratification of the said treaty'; and

"Whereas the apparent purpose of said resolutions and action was to improperly induce or coerce Democratic Senators who might believe that the best interests of the country required the ratification of said treaty, and because thereof held it to be their duty to vote for its ratification, into disregarding that part of their oaths in which they declared that they would faithfully discharge the duties of the office of Senator: Therefore be it

"Resolved, First. That such action by the said or any other caucus is in plain violation of the spirit and intent of the Constitution of the United States.

"Second. That for two-thirds or any other number of the Senators of any party to meet and declare that 'it shall be the duty' of any Senator to vote upon any question other than as his own convictions impel him is a plain violation of the manifest intent and spirit of the Constitution all have sworn to uphold and defend.

"Third. That the 'one vote' the Constitution declares each Senator shall have is his own vote and not the vote of any other or of any number of other Senators, and for a Senator to cast that 'one vote' against his convictions of right and duty in the premises is to disfranchise his State in the Senate and to deprive it of the representation in that body the Constitution provides it shall have.

"Fourth. That when any number of Senators by combination or otherwise undertake, through any species of coercion, to induce other Senators to vote except as their judgments and consciences tell them, it is an invasion of the rights of a State to equal representation with other States in the Senate, and is subversive of their rights to equal representation and the votes of its Senators in the Senate that the Constitution has provided for.

"Fifth. That the Senator who permits any body of other Senators to declare and define for him what his duty is in the matter of his vote in the Senate, and who casts his vote in response to such interference, votes not as a Senator from his own State, but as a Senator from the other States, and he augments the power of the other States beyond that permitted by the Constitution and weakens and degrades the power of his own State in the Senate, in violation of the spirit of the Constitution.

"Sixth. That for any Senator to vote except as his judgment and sense of duty under his oath of office requires is to degrade the high office of Senator and to assail the dignity and standing of the Senate of the United States—qualities possessed in such high degree by no other legislative body in the world."

Mr. LIPPITT. It seems to me, Mr. President, that whatever importance might have attached at the beginning to the propriety or otherwise of enacting this shipping legislation has been dwarfed into insignificance by the selection of the instrument with which it is hoped now to drive this legislation through a Senate in which it had been impossible to hold on its merits a majority in favor of it.

We have become so much accustomed to inconsistencies in the present administration that we have perhaps become hardened to them; but when we consider the situation of an Executive who, in his preelection addresses, had exalted publicity and frankness into such a high place as did Mr. Wilson in his address on "Let there be light," and who again recently reasserted his allegiance to that principle of publicity in no less forcible language in his address before the electrical engineers in Washington last month, on which occasion he used words which, without objection, I shall ask to have inserted in my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

There are, therefore, I suppose, certain rules of the game. I will mention what seem to me some of them. I have already mentioned one of them by way of illustration. First of all is the rule of publicity: Not doing anything under cover; letting the public know what you are doing and judge of it according as it is. There are a great many businesses in this country that have fallen under suspicion because they were so secretive, when there was nothing to secrete that was dishonorable. The minute I keep everything in my pocket and will not show anybody what is there, they conjecture what may be in my pocket; whereas if I turn my pockets inside out the conjecture is, at any rate, dissipated. There is no use inviting suspicion by secretiveness. If a business is being honorably done and successfully done, you ought to be pleased to turn it inside out and let the people whom you are inviting to invest in it see exactly how it is done and with what results. Publicity, which is required in sport, is required in business. Let's see how you are running the game!

Mr. LIPPITT. Then when we find ourselves confronted by this attempt to enact legislation by the device of a secret caucus, and when we find Mr. Wilson expressing in his speech at Indianapolis his high appreciation of the importance of independence in politics and of the independent voter, and we then find this same caucus using this tyrannical two-thirds device to suppress every vestige and possibility of independence in their own ranks, we find a situation developing itself that even the most callous can not be indifferent to.

Mr. Webster forcibly stated the necessity of resisting the first encroachment of Executive domination upon the equal participation in affairs of the coordinate branches of this Government. This situation now has developed far beyond the condition of a first step. It is in the condition of a full-fledged conspiracy, rapidly moving to accomplish its purpose, and demands the immediate consideration of the American Senate and the American people.

We have seen the present Executive undertake an impertinent and entirely improper interference with the internal affairs of a neighboring nation, and when his officious meddling was received with the resentment that was inevitable, not hesitating to use all the influence and powers of his great position, even to the extent of employing the Navy against one of the chief cities of that friendly nation to bring about the demoralization and the horrors of a Villanized Mexico. Patriotism demands that our opposition be swift and decisive against the first steps, however unwittingly they may be made, toward an Executive domination of the government of this country which may ultimately result in the despotism of a Diaz and a Mexicanized America.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire to present to the Senate a communication just received from the Secretary of the Treasury, beginning:

In compliance with the letter I addressed to you yesterday, I now have the pleasure of answering the questions propounded in the resolution introduced in the Senate by Senator BURTON on the 13th instant.

I ask to have this communication inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 16, 1915.

MY DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: In compliance with the letter I addressed to you yesterday, I now have the pleasure of answering the questions propounded in the resolution introduced in the Senate by Senator BURTON on the 13th instant.

First. Has the Secretary of the Treasury knowledge that any officer of the Government has made overtures or addressed inquiries to the owners of ships under the flags of belligerent nations, including those ships now detained in ports of the United States or other neutral ports, with a view to the purchase of such ships on the part of the Government of the United States or any of its authorized agencies?

No; unless certain inquiries made last summer by the Secretary of War as a member of the Board of Relief, composed of the Secretaries of State, Treasury, War, and Navy, appointed by the President on the 5th of August, 1914, to have general charge of the work of relief, protection, and transportation of American citizens abroad, under and by virtue of joint resolution 314, passed August 5, 1914, may be considered as coming within the purview of the question.

It will be recalled that upon the outbreak of the European war in August, 1914, it was estimated that more than 100,000 American citizens were scattered throughout Europe. Their letters of credit had become unavailable because of the breaking down of exchange transactions between the various countries at war, steamship traffic was partially paralyzed, and they were left in a precarious situation. Congress made an appropriation of $2,750,000 for their relief, and by Executive order the President appointed the Board of Relief to which I have referred.

The question of the transportation of American citizens across the high seas was one of the most serious problems with which the Board of Relief had to contend. As the War Department had large experience in transporting troops and handling matters of transportation, this particular branch of the work was intrusted to the Secretary of War. Whatever negotiations he had with steamship companies were solely with a view to making provision for the transportation of American citizens in this emergency. Since the emergency disappeared no communications have been had by the Relief Board, or any member thereof, or any agent or employee of the Government, so far as I have knowledge, with any steamship company or companies or shipowners, except to the extent that such communications have been made necessary to effect a settlement for charter parties or for charges made by such companies for transporting American citizens from Europe to the United States.

Second. Have tenders of sale of any merchant ship or ships carrying the flag of any of the belligerent nations been made to the United States or any of its officers or agencies?

Possibly some vessels were offered to the Secretary of War in connection with the relief and transportation of American citizens, as stated in my answer to the first question.

The Merchant Marine Agency, J. V. McCarthy, manager, of Boston, Mass., in January, 1915, voluntarily and without the solicitation or request of the Secretary of the Treasury sent to the Secretary of the Treasury a list of vessels, some of English and some of German registry, as shown in Exhibit 77 to the report made to the Senate by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Commerce on the 27th of January, 1915, in response to Senate resolution of December 18, 1914, and to which reference is made. Reference is also made to Exhibits 75, 75A, 75B, and 75C of said report, showing some offerings of ships of British and French registry, made through Mr. B. N. Baker, of Baltimore. Mr. Baker gave the information contained in these exhibits in response to a question I asked him, viz, whether it was true, as alleged by opponents of the shipping bill, that no ships other than the interned German vessels could be purchased if the shipping bill became law?

Third. Have there been any tenders for the sale of vessels at present carrying the flag of any neutral nation to the United States or any responsible officer or agent thereof?

I attach as Exhibit No. 1 several letters and voluntary offerings made by the Merchant Marine Agency, of Boston, J. V. McCarthy, manager, dated February 3, 4, and 6, of various ships of neutral registry. The Secretary of the Treasury has entered into no negotiations with Mr. McCarthy or anybody else for the purchase of ships. These offers were submitted to the Treasury Department, as before stated, without solicitation on my part, and resulted, I presume, from the publication of the fact that the shipping bill is under consideration by the Congress, and that the Secretary of the Treasury is mentioned as a member of the shipping board.

Fourth. Is it within the knowledge of the Secretary of the Treasury that any individual, firm, or corporation in the United States has made loans or advances to any individual, firm, or corporation owning ships which are detained in the ports of the United States or elsewhere to avoid the consequences of war; or that any person, firm, or corporation, acting either in private capacity or that of agent for the Government, holds an option on any such ship or ships contemplating their transfer either to the Government of the United States, an agency thereof, or to private citizens of the United States?

I have no knowledge whatever of any such transactions as those referred to in this question, nor have I heard of any such.

Fifth. Is it within the knowledge of the Secretary of the Treasury that the Government of the United States, or any official thereof, has in his employ or under his direction any person or agent who is making inquiry as to the possibility of purchasing any ship or ships of any description whatsoever contemplating their eventual transfer to the United States or an agency thereof?

In each of the above instances the names of the persons, ships, and terms involved in each contemplated sale or purchase is requested.

I have no such knowledge, except as to the Treasury Department, where I can state that neither the Secretary of the Treasury nor anyone under his authority, or acting upon his direction, or as an agent, is making or has made inquiry as to the possibility of purchasing any ship or ships of any description whatsoever contemplating their eventual transfer to the United States or an agency thereof, or otherwise.

In view of false rumors and statements which have come to my ears, permit me to say in conclusion that the Secretary of the Treasury has at no time had a communication from or discussion with any banking house, banking institution, or banker, in or out of the United States, in connection with the purchase, sale, or disposition in any manner whatsoever of the German ships interned in the ports of the United States or elsewhere, or in connection with any other ships of belligerent or neutral nations for any purpose whatsoever.

Respectfully,

W. G. MCADOO, Secretary.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate.

MERCHANT MARINE AGENCY,
Boston, Mass., February 6, 1915.

Mr. COOKSEY,
Private Secretary to Secretary of Treasury,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Inclosed find a description of Dutch, Norwegian, and Swedish boats which I wrote and telegraphed about from New York City.

As I stated when I saw you in Washington, wherever prices are quoted to me in pounds sterling I estimated on $5 to the pound in my list of prices. Where prices have been quoted to me as net prices by some people who have listed their boats for sale, I have added 5 per cent as a commission, which is the customary commission charged in connection with the sale of steamships by brokers in this country.

In the offering of French ships Nos. 24, 25, and 26 I was requested to ask 60,000 pounds sterling for each ship, but to offer the three ships for sale and to try a price of 150,000 pounds sterling for the three. The other ships are all listed exactly as they came to me.

In event of the shipping bill going through and becoming a law I hope to be able to still have some ships left to sell to the Government, but I am now starting a campaign to see what I can do in the way of placing some of these neutral ships in the different shipping centers of the United States.

Very truly, yours,

J. V. MCCARTHY.

[Telegram.]

NEW YORK, February 4, 1915.

SECRETARY TREASURY,
Washington, D. C.:

Can offer nine more Swedish steamships. Particulars later.

McCARTHY.

NEW YORK CITY, February 3, 1915.

SECRETARY UNITED STATES TREASURY,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have cable on Boye Marstal, 8,000-ton dead-weight, Danish, price about $335,000, delivery February. Kindly keep names of ships confidential, as they are my only protection; if other people get hold of names, they could possibly make a sale and I would lose out on commission.

Respectfully,

J. V. McCARTHY.

NEW YORK CITY, February 3, 1915.

SECRETARY UNITED STATES TREASURY,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I can offer you for purchase two steamships in Holland, Prins Willem I, 24,100 pounds sterling; Prins Willem V, 17,500 pounds sterling.

I will write further when I arrive in Boston.

Respectfully,

J. V. McCARTHY.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have here something which I should be willing to have read, but I presume it is sufficient to insert it in the RECORD. The Secretary of the Treasury delivered an interesting address before the Chamber of Commerce of the United States on the 4th of February, which I should like to have inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ADDRESS OF SECRETARY M'ADOO BEFORE THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES, AT WASHINGTON, D. C., FEBRUARY 4, 1915.

"Before I begin my speech I want to take exception to the statement of your presiding officer that the Secretary of the Treasury is not a seafaring man. He unconsciously betrayed in that statement the ignorance on the part of the American public at large of the functions of the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury is the oldest seafaring man in the history of the American Government. Since 1790 the Secretary of the Treasury has been the head of the most unique and gallant and remarkable service known to the history of the nations, the Revenue-Cutter Service. It was the inception of the American Navy, and to-day there is not a sailor who faces the wintry or the summer sea, nor a passenger who is bound homeward or outward upon one of those great ocean liners, who does not feel safer and more secure because he knows that that service, maintained by the American people, is on guard to protect him against the disasters of the sea. And this gives me an opportunity of saying, ladies and gentlemen, that when criticism is made of this bill because the Secretary of Commerce and the Secretary of the Treasury are made members of the proposed shipping board that you are putting men at the head of this commission who do not know anything about the sea or anything about the shipping business, it is an error.

"I am not here to appeal for a place on the shipping board. That is the last thing I want myself—and when I speak of the Secretary of the Treasury I am not speaking of myself, but of the office and of the duties that devolve upon it and of the appropriateness in any enterprise of this character of having these two men, these two Government officials, charged with great responsibilities in connection with the shipping interests of this country, upon that board.

"In the first place, the Secretary of Commerce has charge of all the lighthouses in this country; he has charge of the light-house-tender service of this country, running a fleet of vessels in connection with that service, and he is bound to know something about the shipping business. He comes intimately into contact with it at various points of the compass. The Secretary of the Treasury, in the command and direction of that splendid fleet of 44 vessels, whose value in the aggregate is as large as that of many of the merchant fleets of the world—and greater than any of them in the service that it performs—must have knowledge in very considerable degree of the shipping business. He, with the Secretary of Commerce, enforces the navigation laws of this country. He, in connection with the Secretary of Commerce, deals with every ship's manifest that is filed in this country. I might enumerate the manifold points at which these two great departments come into intimate touch with the merchant marine of all the nations in the world, making it necessary both for the heads of these departments and for their staffs to keep in close connection and relationship with the shipping interests of all the nations that have intercourse with the United States of America.

"Objection has been made against this bill that the Government may make a loss if it goes into the shipping business. I do not think the Government will make a loss. But are we to be determined in our action about great and vital national policies by the question as to whether or not we may lose or make a few hundred dollars or a few thousand dollars?

"Let me illustrate by the Revenue-Cutter Service. In the last year, 1914, it cost $2,500,000, approximately, to keep those vessels in service. Under the regulations of the department no revenue cutter can stay in port over 24 hours without an explanation to the department. Why? Because its function is to keep upon the high seas, to save life and property, as well as to protect our coast against smuggling and other offenses. The revenue cutters, in saving vessels at sea, do a salvage business without charge, and wrecking and salvage companies have complained that the Government is engaged in private business, competing with private wrecking and salvage companies, but should we abandon the Revenue-Cutter Service for this reason?

"In the year 1914 the Revenue-Cutter Service saved nearly $10,000,000 of shipping property in peril at sea, and it saved, in addition to that, 450 or more priceless human lives; and yet, would you say, gentlemen, that the Revenue-Cutter Service should be abolished because it costs this Government money to maintain it? Are we governed by such sordid considerations that nothing should be done by the Government unless a profit is received? Why did we build the Panama Canal, in which we have invested over $375,000,000? Did we do that because we expected to make a financial profit for this Nation? Would we have hesitated to enter upon that great work because we could not see at the end of it an actual money return upon our investment? Where the vital interests of this Nation are at stake, where the lives of its citizens are involved, where the property of its subjects is put in peril by the seas or otherwise, it is the function of government, regardless of cost, to come to the relief of its people.

"And so, my friends, when American commerce is to-day in jeopardy; when, through acts of belligerent nations in which the innocent American people had no part, freight rates are soaring to impossible heights, hampering our commerce, affecting our material as well as our financial interests, affecting, in large measure, the actual life of the Nation itself, I confess that I have no patience with the idea that the American Government must sit with fettered feet and trammeled hands and refuse to protect the American farmer, the American business man, and the American producer in circumstances of this kind.

"My friends, there are times in the life of every nation when it is necessary that every power of the Government shall be exercised to protect the property, the rights, and the lives of its citizens, and this is a time when we must face this issue squarely and when we must not, because of any hidebound dogma or any academic theories, or any fears that this or that thing may happen, hesitate to go straight forward in the path of duty, and do the things that are necessary to be done, and do them at the time that it is necessary to do them, because remedies are not worth a continental unless they are applied when the disease is at the acute stage.

"Now, we are at the acute stage. Since August, 1914, our commerce has been seriously affected by the conditions which have arisen on the other side of the water. In response to a Senate resolution, the Secretary of Commerce and myself made a report to the Senate a few days ago, and I want to read to you a few things in this report which will convey to you more strikingly than any words of mine can possibly convey, the conditions that affect American shipping interests, American farmers, American manufacturers, and American business men in general who are interested in our export and import trade.

"These letters were sent to the two departments without any direct request whatever for information. They were voluntarily sent in response to the request in the Senate resolution that these two departments, connected as they are with the shipping and business interests of the country, should furnish all available information.

"Garcia & Co., general commission merchants of San Francisco, wrote under date of January 5, as follows:

"We beg to say that we ourselves have shipped in the last two months 500 or 600 tons of dried fruit to New York, through the canal at Panama, for reshipment to Scandinavian ports, and also to Holland. To a great extent these goods have been in New York for a long time, for the reason that our forwarding agents, Messrs. C. B. Richards & Co., could not get any space. It seems that whenever the Scandinavian-American Line are asking higher freight rates, other lines do so, too, and now even the Holland-American Line is asking 100 shillings for 2,240 pounds, while only a few days ago this company asked 45 shillings for 2,240 pounds. These advances in freight rates are made without notice, and even previous engagements have not been protected. So that the shippers, instead of making a small profit on their sales to European countries, are losing money.

"And yet I have heard it seriously contended, although I know I need not discuss such a proposition with intelligent American business men, that freight rates, ocean transportation rates, do not make any difference to our business men, because the man on the other side pays it. There is not a man within the sound of my voice who has anything to do with business who does not know that the cost of transportation is an elemental and serious factor in every business transaction involving the shipment or movement of goods.

"William Haas & Sons, manufacturers and exporters of 'D' shovel handles, Houston Heights, Tex., December 28, 1914:

"For years our entire output has been disposed of abroad, but owing to the present prohibitive tariffs in ocean transportation we are unable to deliver our goods, consequently our plant will remain closed down until such rates are established as will enable us to market our goods. * * * In our judgment a Government merchant marine will solve the problem.

"Charles E. Moore, president Leaf Tobacco Association, Baltimore, Md., December 28, 1914:

"* * * I desire to file with your department an urgent protest against the unwarranted advance in freight rates on tobacco as recently established by the Holland-American Line. Some of our exporting members shipping to Holland points have signed contracts with this company, expiring December 31, 1914, for a rate of $3.50 per hogshead of tobacco. This contract has been disregarded entirely and the rate increased first to $5.25, then to $6.85, and to-day a notice that it will be $7.50 until further notice. This, I repeat, in the face of the written contract for $3.50 per hogshead.

"Gano, Moore & Co., coal, coke, iron, steel, ores, Philadelphia, Pa., December 28, 1914:

"The shortage of vessels is so serious now that it is practically stopping the exportation of coal. We have several orders for coal, principally to South American ports, and it is impossible to secure vessels.

"American Tripoli Co., 'Tripoli' flour, Seneca, Mo., December 28, 1914:

"We have an offer of some orders from Barcelona, Spain, and the first two of the attached letters refer to our effort to get quoted us a rate from New Orleans to Barcelona; and you will see that the steamship company operating steamers to Barcelona refuse to quote rates at all. In the first letter the reason given was that other commodities which permit of a higher rate are being carried, so that our material, which must have a lower rate, is not at all desirable, and they even refuse to quote rates at all. * * * The fourth letter, dated December 18, quotes us a rate of 49 cents per 100 pounds from New Orleans to Havre, France, and for comparison will say that just previous to the European war, on July 3, 1914, we made a shipment at the rate of 18 cents per 100 pounds, a little more than one-third of the rate now asked. This high rate is, of course, prohibitive on a commodity such as ours.

"Inman, Akers & Inman, Atlanta, Ga., December 28, 1914:

"We are paying ocean freight from Savannah to Rotterdam and to Bremen of $2, $2.25, to $3 per hundredweight. Formerly the rates to these places were about 35 cents per hundredweight on cotton.

"W. B. Cooper & Co., cotton merchants, Wilmington, N. C., December 31, 1914:

"Please allow us to indorse the action of the administration in trying to secure boats for the movement of American products. We are frank to say that as a general proposition we are not anxious to see the United States Government get into too many lines of business, but when 3 cents per pound or more is to be paid freight on cotton across the water against 35 cents per hundred pounds six months ago it is time something should be done, in our opinion. (Three cents per pound equals $15 per bale; 35 cents per hundredweight equals $1.75 per bale.)

"T. F. Jenings, hardwood manufacturer, Marianna, Fla., December 28, 1914:

"I am exporting hickory lumber in bundles to Christiania, Norway, and freight rates have become so exorbitant that it is almost out of the question to ship. * * * Now, I am compelled, under the circumstances, to shut down my business if this can not be rectified.

"Funch, Edye & Co., steamship agents and ship brokers, in a letter to T. F. Jenings, Marianna, Fla., December 14, 1914, state:

"We have no room to offer prior to the steamship United States, March 11.

"Chattanooga Wheelbarrow Co., Chattanooga, Tenn., December 26, 1914:

"We have been endeavoring for about a month to get a shipment through some of the Atlantic or Gulf ports for shipment to Bristol or Liverpool. * * * We are still holding this carload trying to get booking through some of the various steamship companies, and in this connection would state we have three more cars which we want to get out early in the year, provided we can get them handled from port.

"Brown & Adams, wool commission merchants, Boston, Mass., December 30, 1914:

"We have been unable to make shipments wool from Buenos Aires to Boston or New York since December 15. Very little chance securing freight room for next 30 days account scarcity of vessels. Have over $600,000 worth waiting shipment already paid for. Freight rates when available about 150 per cent increase over last year.

"Ike Manheimer, green and dried apples, Rochester, N. Y., December 28, 1914:

"In connection with the Scandinavian-American Line out of New York (Messrs. Funch, Edye & Co., agents), I have had so much trouble in securing space to Copenhagen and in getting the goods on board steamer, even after the space had been promised, that I was compelled to stop selling goods to Copenhagen. * * * The freight on fresh apples in barrels is almost equal to the value of the apples, and practically prohibitive.

"The Norwegian-American Line (Messrs. Benham & Boyesen, agents) has until recently given me very satisfactory service out of New York to points in Norway, * * * but has now also advanced the rates to the above maximum quotations and notified me within a short time that no space is available until next April.

"American Glue Co., Boston, Mass., December 30, 1914:

"Within the past few days, having a shipment of merchandise to export from this port to Liverpool, we were informed by the carriers that they could not handle same at all on account of having more freight than they could handle.

"Phoenix Iron & Steel Co., Galveston, Tex., December 26, 1914:

"* * * We are shippers of old rails and scrap iron and steel. * * * Steamship companies now either quote abnormal freights or refuse to quote at all, so it is impossible to ship any material, as the freights in some cases amount to three-fourths of the delivered price of the commodity.

"L. & E. Frenkel, importers of electric specialties, New York, N. Y., December 31, 1914:

"We procured orders to ship gas coal to Italy, but on account of the high shipping rates we can not ship it.

"J. D. Kremelberg & Co., Baltimore, Md., December 26, 1914:

"We are shippers of Maryland, Ohio, Kentucky, and Virginia tobacco to Europe, and most of our shipments are consigned to Holland, Germany, Austria, Italy, Norway, and Belgium. At present only shipments to Holland, Italy, and Norway are possible at prohibitive rates. In fact, the latter have become so high that now cable orders, 'Stop buying,' have been received.

"Although we have made a yearly contract with the Holland-American Line—the only shipping opportunity from here to Holland—as per copy inclosed, this line has arbitrarily raised its rates 100 to 300 per cent, and even at the raised rates shipments can be booked only for first available room.

"Rates to Italy also have become entirely too high; i. e., from $4 per hogshead of Maryland tobacco to about $27, or nearly 3½ cents a pound, so that tobacco shipments have become out of question.

"R. M. Bryan, eastern manager of the Black Diamond, New York, December 30, 1914:

"This business (coal industry) has been almost prostrated by the inability of shippers to secure vessels and upon terms that will permit them to make shipments.

"Henry Lauts & Co., Baltimore, Md., December 29, 1914:

"The present rates charged by this line (Holland-American Line) are almost prohibitive and are a decided menace to the tobacco-export industry of this country.

"Industrial Lumber Co., Elizabeth, La., January 5, 1915:

"We have in the past exported considerable lumber to England, Holland, Germany, and some to France. Since the war, however, we have been unable to make any shipments, primarily because of the uncertainty of securing vessels; also on account of the excessive freight rates.

"Danforth Geer, president Walter A. Wood Mowing & Reaping Machine Co., Hoosick Falls, N. Y., January 9, 1915:

"We find, however, that the cost of getting goods to foreign ports and the uncertainty of proper shipping facilities is becoming a great menace and will have a very serious effect on the business that we have in hand and wish to protect.

"* * * We can not but feel that the steamship companies are taking advantage of present conditions to exact rates which are all out of reason and which are unjust and unfair.

"* * * It would appear to us that there never was a more opportune time for this country, either under legislative action or private capital, to create a merchant marine, for lack of which, in our judgment, this country has suffered for many years. We can only hope that some measures may be enacted or some policy created which will relieve the present situation, and in time to affect our business interests this year.

"G. Stallings & Co., Lynchburg, Va., tobacco exporters, December 28, 1914:

"There is a considerable scarcity of steamers flying the American or neutral flags, and unless more ships can be put at the disposal of shippers, causing a general reduction of ocean freight rates, which are now unreasonable, excessive, and almost prohibitive, the export business of this country is bound to suffer greatly.

"M. B. Nelson, general sales manager the Long-Bell Lumber Co., Kansas City, Mo., December 29, 1914:

"I inclose a quotation from ship brokers, issued under date of December 26, showing rates have advanced more than 300 per cent. * * * We now have in pile at port a little over 9,000,000 feet of lumber, of an approximate value of $280,000, all of which is deteriorating and could be disposed of if shipping facilities would permit.

"There are many others in the same condition as ourselves, and we sincerely hope you can do something to relieve the situation.

"Panama Railroad Co., January 15, 1915:

"Our stock (of coal) has been reduced from 90,000 to 40,000 tons, and both the Earn Line and our company are scouring the charter market in the effort to secure sufficient tonnage to carry to the Isthmus the amount of coal it is imperative we should keep there.

"Gentlemen, there are something like 75 letters of a similar character in this pamphlet. I do not want to take your time to read them. I wish, indeed, that a copy of this document might be put in the hands of every delegate here, and if it would not be violating the rules of the chamber I should like very much to have permission to send for distribution among the members of this convention copies of this report, which has been printed and issued as a public document by the Senate. It is entitled 'Senate Document No. 673, part 2, Increased Ocean Transportation Rates.'

"Now, as to the effect of these rates. I should like to summarize them very briefly from this report:

"From the foregoing tables it will be observed that ocean freight rates on grain from New York to Rotterdam have been increased since the outbreak of the war 900 per cent; on flour, 500 per cent; on cotton, 700 per cent.

"From New York to Liverpool the rates on the same commodities have increased from 300 to 500 per cent.

"From Baltimore to European ports, excepting Germany, rates have been increased on grain, 900 per cent; on flour, 364 per cent; on cotton, 614 per cent.

"From Norfolk to Liverpool rates on grain have been increased from 157 to 200 per cent; on cotton, 186 per cent.

"From Norfolk to Rotterdam the rates on cotton have been increased 471 per cent; to Bremen the rates have increased on cotton 1,100 per cent, namely, from $1.25 per bale to $15 per bale.

"From Savannah to Liverpool the rates have been increased on cotton 250 per cent; to Bremen the rates have been increased on cotton 900 per cent.

"From Galveston to Liverpool the rates have been increased on grain 174 per cent; on cotton, 361 per cent; to Bremen the rates have been increased on cotton 1,061 to 1,150 per cent.

"Since this report was written, gentlemen, freight rates have in many instances been still further increased. Now, it is stated that marine insurance and war-risk insurance have added very greatly to these costs. Let me say to you that the marine insurance rates have been increased one-eighth of 1 per cent only since the war broke out, while war-risk insurance rates have been very much reduced. The war-risk insurance rate to Liverpool is only 2 per cent and to Bremen it is only 3 per cent, made so by the Government of the United States, and if the Government of the United States were not to-day in this privatest kind of private war-risk insurance business, gentlemen, the rates of war-risk insurance would be prohibitive, and they might be stopping American ships altogether. And yet in the face of these uncontroverted facts and with the situation growing more acute every day we stand here and talk and talk and talk while American interests are being put daily into greater jeopardy because some people prefer to be bound by a hoary dogma than to have the Government protect its own citizens and the business men and producers of this country by doing for them what private capital refuses to do.

"Now, gentlemen, I had hoped very much when the shipping question came up that it would not be treated as a partisan question. There is nothing that I deplore more than the fact that this question has, by the action of our politicians—and I use the term not in disrespect, but because it is descriptive—I deeply regret that our politicians have succeeded in making this a partisan question, because it is not a partisan question and no man in this hall and no impartial American mind interested in the welfare of this country ought to be influenced by partisan considerations in passing a deliberative judgment upon it. To show you that it is not a partisan question and has never been a partisan question, I want to read you what the Democratic and Republican and Progressive platforms said on this question in 1912.

"The Democratic national platform of 1912 said:

"We believe in fostering, by constitutional regulation of commerce, the growth of the merchant marine which shall develop and strengthen the commercial ties which bind us to our sister Republics of the south, but without imposing additional burdens upon the people, and without bounties or subsidies from the Public Treasury.

"The Democratic Party made similar declarations in 1880, 1884, 1904, and 1908; in other words, since 1880 down to the present time it has declared in favor of an American merchant marine. But the party has always stood against subsidies, and that is a very important point to remember in this discussion, because it has a material bearing upon the possibility of getting any remedy whatever for existing conditions.

"The Republican Party said in 1912:

"We believe that one of the country's most urgent needs is a revived merchant marine.

"But I judge, from what is happening up there on the hill, that they have not read this platform lately.

"There should be American ships, and plenty of them—

"They are not satisfied with American ships; they want plenty of them—

"To make use of the great American oceanic canal now nearing completion.

"They have reiterated those declarations for the last 30 years.

"The Progressive Party, while it did not come out specifically for a merchant marine in express terms, had this to say:

"The time has come when the Federal Government should cooperate with manufacturers and producers in extending our foreign commerce.

"That is one thing in the Progressive platform that I thoroughly approve.

"To this end we demand adequate appropriations by Congress and the appointment of diplomatic and consular officers solely with a view to their special fitness and worth and not in consideration of political expediency. It is imperative to the welfare of our people that we enlarge and extend our foreign commerce. We are preeminently fitted to do this because as a people we have developed high skill in the art of manufacturing; our business men are strong executives and strong organizers. In every way possible our Federal Government should cooperate in this important matter.

"I want to read you now just one more section from the Republican platform of 1900. Here is what they said:

"Our present dependence upon foreign shipping for nine-tenths of our foreign-carrying trade is a great loss to the industry of this country.

"They admitted it was a great loss to the industry of this country.

"It is also a serious danger to our trade—

"Mind you, this was 14 years ago. This fellow had sense—

"It is also a serious danger to our trade, for its sudden withdrawal in the event of European war would seriously cripple our expanding foreign commerce. The national defense and naval efficiency of this country, moreover, supply a compelling reason for legislation which will enable us to recover our former place among the trade-carrying fleets of the world.

"Now, gentlemen, that is a singularly distinct and a singularly prophetic declaration in that platform of one of our political parties—the platform of the party which was then dominant in this country and had control in 1900. Yes, sir; they had control of both branches of the Congress, if I am not mistaken, Senator [addressing Senator BURTON], and they were in position to legislate upon this important question.

"Did they do anything? If so, I have not heard of it. And if they had carried out that statesmanlike utterance—and I am liberal enough always to give my political oppenents, even, credit—if they had carried out that really statesmanlike utterance—because the man who wrote that had the vision of a seer and the imagination of a statesman—if they had carried that out, I venture to say that American commerce, American foreign trade, would be double what it is to-day.

"Of course that is an opinion; I can not prove it; but I am just as satisfied as I am that I am talking here that that would have been the result, and I say that it would have paid the American people to have contributed any reasonable amount for that purpose.

"That brings us back to the question of subsidy. The Republican Party favored a subsidy. Why did they not give us a subsidy? Why did they not do it? They had the power to do it. For 14 years, gentlemen, since that declaration was made, we have sat like knots on a log and done nothing.

"When you have an administration that is willing to do something for the American business man are you going to support it or are you not?

"I am not wedded to Government ownership and operation of anything. I do not want to see the American Government engaged in any activity where private capital, upon reasonable terms, will come in, but I am opposed to the American Government sitting still in the face of an acute crisis when our vital interests are at stake and waiting for the benevolence of private capital to come in and rescue us from a critical situation, when, for more than 50 years, private capital has refused to do anything to relieve the situation.

"When I think of this shipping business and of the claim of private capital to further consideration, it reminds me very much of that famous colloquy between Weber and Fields in New York some years ago. Fields proposed to Weber—who was always the goat—that they organize a 'skindicate.' Mind you, a 'skindicate,' to go into the shipping business. After some parley Weber said, 'Vell, vhere do I come in?' Fields said, 'Vell, I furnish ze ocean and you furnish ze ships.'

"Private capital has furnished the ocean for 50 years, but who has furnished the ships? Our foreign competitors, who master the seas and who to-day have the entire power to destroy American commerce or to retard it, as they see fit, because they can lift the rates over night and there is no power to control them—and they are doing it over night and putting them at such prohibitive figures that they can stop any export they want to from this country to-day. And we sit here and gabble about whether the Government shall or shall not come in and relieve the situation.

"Eleven hundred per cent! Why, even a banker would call that excessive. And they put that on cotton, when the poor people in the South are groaning and grinding under the load that was saddled on them by the first cannon shot that echoed throughout Europe; and we sit here and talk about the Government not coming to the front and doing something to relieve the situation.

"What is government for? Is it something in a straitjacket? Is it sitting in a corner like a concrete thing with palsied hands, afraid to act, or is it something vital? Is it a flexible instrument in the hands of the people of this country, to be used within constitutional limitations for their relief and benefit? Is it intended to be something to act in this emergency, something to come to the front and do things for the American people when private capital can not be commanded or commandeered or persuaded for that purpose? Why, my friends, it does not seem to me that there is room for argument. This shipping bill seems to be a matter of such vital consequence to somebody—I am not questioning motives, gentlemen, and I do not want you to understand me as indulging in innuendo, because I do not; I impute no motives to anyone; I no not believe in winning that way. I would not get a vote out of this Chamber in favor of this bill by an argument that I felt would be demeaning to myself or to the Government, but I do want to say with all the sincerity that I can command, that for some reason somebody is more concerned about the Government not relieving this situation than they have been about anything that has come before the American people within my lifetime or within my knowledge, except the currency bill.

"Now, I want to say this about the currency bill, and it is very apropos. We talked about a revision of the currency for something like 30 or 40 years. In the meantime we sat still and did nothing. We literally did nothing except talk. While we talked we paid the penalty in untold millions of loss, in panic after panic, for our stupidity and our lack of courage. Finally this administration took hold of the currency question. The section of the country to-day that is most opposed to this shipping bill was most opposed to the currency bill. I believe it was because they did not understand the measure. They did not know what the currency bill meant, and we had to fight every night and day for nearly six months—continuous fighting—to get the Federal reserve act passed; and I want to read you just one little paragraph in connection with the Federal reserve act from a speech which was made in Congress about a month before it was passed. [After glancing at speech referred to.] Why, this was made only 10 days before it passed. Here is what was said:

"I say that this bill presents a financial heresy twice repudiated by the people of the United States. I say that the central reserve board appointed under this bill will have to represent that very heresy. If this bill passes as it stands, America stands to lose all she saved when Grant vetoed the inflation bill, all we saved when Grover Cleveland abolished the silver purchase, all we saved when we elected McKinley, all the Republicans and all the gold Democrats saved when they helped in the repudiation of the vital principle which has been put into this bill.

"That rather startling declaration had relation to the character of the Federal reserve notes, and the earnest and solemn statement made with impressive warning to the people of America in this very speech was that the Federal reserve notes were fiat money or greenbacks! And yet there is nothing in this country, not even a Government bond—I say it advisedly, because I know; this is one thing I really know—that even a Government bond is not as secure as a Federal reserve note. It has not got as large assets back of it; no Government bond has. And yet this gentleman solemnly warned the American people that these notes were greenbacks, and that they were going to repeat the very financial heresy which for years had been prevented from being grafted upon the people of this country.

"Who do you suppose made that speech? One of the most distinguished men in the Republican Party—a man for whose ability and intelligence I have the greatest respect. That man was the senior Senator from the State of New York—Senator ELIHU ROOT; and that is what he said about the currency bill 10 days before it was enacted into law.

"I want to read you, gentlemen, what I happened to see the other day in a paper that I read every once in a while, to see if I am getting too progressive—because this paper is so reactionary that it is enough to pull a fellow into a hole if he will read it long enough. Here is a paper that fought the Federal reserve act from A to izzard—one of many. I am told that the sentiment against the shipping bill in the city of New York and in the city of Boston is unanimous. It does not surprise me. The sentiment in each of those cities was similarly unanimous against the Federal reserve act. It is due to the fact—— [Cries of 'No!' 'No!']

"I say I am told so. I am glad to hear you deny it, gentlemen, because I got this from some politician or some newspaper, and whenever a politician or a newspaper tells me anything I am inclined to believe it! I am glad to hear that it is not accurate.

"Here is what this paper said the other day—the Federal reserve banks had been in operation for only two months—and here is what it said:

"The Federal reserve bank is the reliance of the present—

"My goodness, what has happened to this fellow?—

"and the promise of the future.

"Think of it! In a year absolutely turned around, admitting that the administration knew what it was doing when it passed the Federal reserve act. He says:

"It is the promise of the future, as the clearing house was in the past—

"The clearing house does not come within a mile of the Federal reserve act—

"Its first report is the starting point of a new banking dispensation, in which panics are to be prevented rather than cured. In some respects the Federal Reserve System is the enactment of the clearing-house system.

"Of course they do not like to say unreservedly that they did not make a great impression upon the character of this bill, and therefore they want to tell us it is rather a beautified clearing-house system; but it is deeper than that.

"I will not read any more of that. It is significant of the change of opinion that has come over the country since that act was passed; and yet, my friends, let me say to you that if that act had not been passed and nothing had been done with our currency system—and I speak somewhat advisedly, because I think there has not been a minute of the time since that fateful day in July last when the first declaration of war was made in Europe to the present time when the great department over which I have the honor to preside has not had to be intimately in touch with every part of financial business in this country—I say to you advisedly that if it had not been for that great measure, that great constructive measure, the Aldrich-Vreeland bill, even as modified by that act, would not have saved this situation, and there is no telling what penalty the American people would be paying to-day for the neglect of the American Congress to give them that very vital and necessary measure of protection. I violate no confidence, gentlemen, when I say that if it had not been for President Wilson standing almost single-handed and alone against the advice of many strong and influential men in this country, who earnestly and honestly believed, as a matter of judgment, that the Congress ought to adjourn after the passage of the tariff law, this act might not have been upon the statute books even by this time. But it was because, with that singular prescience of his, a singular power, a wise divination, so to speak, he insisted that the Congress remain in session until action was taken upon a measure which was absolutely vital to the business interests of the people of this country, that this great law was passed.

"My friends, am I unreasonable when I say to you that the gentlemen who are so strenuously opposing the shipping bill may be similarly mistaken? The opposition comes from the same interests that denounced the currency act. What possible harm can come to you business men—I want somebody to answer this—what possible harm can come to you business men if the Government steps in in this emergency to relieve the situation, to protect you against the eventualities of war, to save your commerce and your business. Because I tell you now, and I make the prediction with confidence, that if this bill is not passed there is not a man in this audience who will not rise up and denounce himself inside of 12 months because he would not allow us to do the things that were necessary to save him.

"What carries your commerce to-day? What is the protection of American commerce to-day? It is the flag of one nation—a nation involved in war, at that—the British flag. That is the only thing that stands between you and complete cessation of your export and import trade. I mean almost complete cessation, because more than 50 per cent of the bottoms in service to-day upon the seas sail under the English flag. Once you put that flag in more serious jeopardy than it is to-day, what is going to happen to you? What will happen to you? You may have a complete cessation of your export trade. Do you know what that means? It means disaster throughout this country; it means absolute disaster, because if you are deprived of the opportunity of selling your surplus at reasonable or profitable prices, what are you going to have at home? Simply panic and disaster and trouble. Yet, when the sure salvation of your situation is to let the Government come in and do this thing in your interests, you hesitate.

"Since I have come to Washington there is one word in the English language with which I have become more familiar than any other, because it is the one word that is used most. I say that advisedly. I use it myself too much, and every time I use it I get ashamed of myself. You can talk to any man about anything and the first thing he says is 'I am afraid of so and so and so and so.' He is afraid of something. Where is the courage of the American Nation? Where is that virile power that has made this American Nation great? Has it disappeared? I do not believe it. We are not afraid of anything, my friends, so long as we walk the path of rectitude and justice as a nation, and we intend to do that; and if this shipping bill passes, all this talk about getting into international difficulties is mere twaddle. Why, my friends, there is no more danger of getting into international difficulties if this bill is passed than there is that I will pick up the Washington Monument and walk across the Potomac River with it. Let us get rid of this bogy now and forever. The American Government is going to stand upon its plain rights, which are the rights of justice and neutrality, and if there is a man in the United States of America who is a firmer friend of peace or who has stood more strongly and courageously for it than the President of the United States, I would like to be introduced to him.

"Now, gentlemen, on the question of international relations I wish to say this: I do not know of any protests that have been filed by any foreign Government against this shipping bill. This is a matter of domestic concern, in which no foreign nation has the right to say one word. This is a matter of policy for this country alone to determine. The execution of that policy is another question. The execution of that policy means that we have to observe the rules of international law and the conditions of neutrality. That being done, nobody can complain. Can this Nation ever surrender to anybody the power to protect itself and its own citizens? Who proposes that—who means it seriously? I do not believe that any man could mean any such thing seriously; and yet there are speeches in Congress where it has been seriously suggested.

"Why, the historic position that this country has taken ever since its existence is in favor of the right to do the very things that we are attempting in this shipping bill. But if anybody is sensitive about the exercise of that right, let me call his attention to one or two things that have been done. Shortly after the war began, recognizing the serious and grave situation that confronted this country, because of the paralysis of shipping and the complete disorganization of international credits, the Secretary of the Treasury on the 7th day of August, three days after the first serious effects of the involvement of all of these nations in war had become apparent, issued a call to the country asking for the cooperation of the responsible bankers and business men and shipping men in an effort to accomplish two things: First, to restore our shipping so that grain, which was piled up in every port on the Atlantic and Gulf seaboards, could be moved; and, second, to reestablish foreign exchange upon a normal basis. In response to that call, gentlemen came to the Treasury Department representing in the highest degree the business interests of this country. I wish I had time to read all their names to you, but I am obliged to read just a few. Among them were Mr. J. A. Farrell, of New York, and Mr. P. A. S. Franklin, of New York. Mr. Farrell is the president of the United States Steel Corporation. Mr. Franklin is the vice president of the International Mercantile Marine Co. Mr. Bernard Baker, of Baltimore, well known in the shipping world, a gentleman who has no interests of any kind in the shipping business, and who is interested in this great question purely as an American citizen, and who knows the vitality of the question and the necessity of acting promptly upon it, was also present, as were also Mr. Robert Dollar, of San Francisco, Mr. Hemphill, of New York, and many other prominent men, including President Fahey, of Boston, who is now the president of this Chamber of Commerce of the United States.

"Now, gentlemen, that conference passed several resolutions. I am going to read you two that have a bearing on this question:

"Resolved, That this conference urge the United States Government to establish a bureau of war-risk insurance, to be administered under the direction of a suitable Government department by a board of three or five members, which shall assume the risks of war on American vessels and American cargoes shipped or to be shipped therein whenever, in the judgment of the board, it shall appear that American vessels or shippers in American vessels are unable in any particular trade to compete on equal terms with the vessels or shippers of other nationalities by reason of the protection offered such other carriers or shippers by arrangements for indemnity through their Governments; and that such board have power to fix rates of premium.

"That resulted in the enactment of the war-risk insurance measure to which I have already referred.

"Resolved, That the present opportunity to extend American foreign trade and the opportunity now to begin the creation of a mercantile marine under the United States flag is so great that this conference appeals to Congress by immediate and effective legislation and by necessary changes in our navigation laws to make it possible for our citizens, without discrimination, to buy and operate ships under American registry in foreign trade on equal competitive terms with all other maritime nations.

"Those were significant declarations by men prominent in the business and banking world, most of them not Democrats in politics—men willing to put aside partisan considerations and come here to Washington and ask this Government to go, first, into private business for the purpose of protecting the shippers of this country, because war-risk insurance in times like these is just as essential a part of the shipping business as the steel plates in the hull of the vessel, and no vessel will go to sea without war-risk insurance any more than it would go to sea without a crew. And here they ask this Government to go into private business to protect the American business man. When that matter came before Congress it was voted for by Democrats and Republicans alike. It was passed by a yea-and-nay vote in the Senate, and the distinguished Senator from Ohio is one of the men who voted for it, or, at least, he is not recorded against it. There was opposition in the House, led by Mr. MANN, the Republican leader, but the measure was overwhemingly passed, and a day or two after that the War Risk Bureau was started. It was made a bureau of the Treasury Department and is actually doing business in insuring American ships.

"Now, they say that the Government can not conduct any business without a loss of efficiency and without extremely great expense. Let me call your attention, gentlemen, to what has happened in the war-risk business. Now, this is mighty private business. It collides with other people who are in the war-risk insurance business. But it was justified. It was the right thing to do. They may say, 'Well, that was only a temporary measure, because it has to expire with the war.' Of course it has to expire with the war. What is war-risk insurance for except for use while the war is in progress, but the principle is the same.

"We have issued up to February 2, 1915—the bureau went into operation on September 2—nearly $48,000,000 of insurance upon American ships and cargoes, and we have kept the rates down. The premiums we have received to date in actual money paid into the Treasury of the United States amount to $1,250,000. Earned premiums to date on expired risks are $397,897, and we have not made a loss yet.

"Now, gentlemen, suppose we had said, 'Oh, well, we will reject this; we can't afford to have the Government engaged in private business,' just as they are saying about the shipping bill: 'You are bound to run this thing at a loss. You will involve the American people in a loss.' Suppose we had done that. Where would we be to-day? I hesitate to tell you what would have happened to the commerce of America if this had not been done. What do you suppose it has cost us to run the bureau up to this time? Mind you, we have taken in $397,987. You would think $50,000 very reasonable for handling the bureau during that time, wouldn't you? It has cost us exactly $6,449.68 to do the business.

"Did we put any conditions in the war-risk insurance bill that we must not issue an insurance policy on an American vessel unless we had the consent of some other power? Not a bit of it. It is our business. We have a right to do this thing. But they say, 'If you are going into the ship business, you will get us into trouble.'

"My friends, when the Government of the United States insures the cargo and the hull of a vessel a policy is issued under the seal of this Government and signed by its responsible executive officer insuring that cargo, and when a vessel and cargo are seized and taken into a prize court this Government has a direct interest in the issue. We insure as much as a million dollars upon any one hull and cargo. Suppose a vessel is seized, as I said before. A million dollars is the equivalent of four good tramp steamships. You could buy four good tramp steamers for a million dollars. So we have, analogously, four ships under this flag belonging to this Government in a prize court in a foreign country. Are we afraid of it? Certainly not. When the Government goes into the war-risk insurance business it goes in as any citizen would go in. It divests itself, to a certain extent, of its sovereignty, because it is engaging in private business; and that is one of the most extreme cases I could cite where a Government has directly gone into a business which might involve it in such complications as these gentlemen fear. But it has no elements of danger, because we expect those cases to be determined in the same way as if they affected any citizen of the world, by the decision of a just prize court, and we can not complain as long as we get justice—and that, of course, we will get.

"We passed a ship-registry bill. There is a lot of cry about free ships. They say, 'Just give us free ships; that is the remedy.' Do you know that you have had free ships since 1912? What effect has the ship-registry bill had on our commerce? Nothing; literally nothing.

"Do you know that under the Panama Canal act you get 'free ships,' and that everything that enters into the furnishing of a ship is 'free'? And yet American capital has not come forward to do anything. Do you know why? The Chamber of Commerce of New York made a report by their experts—I know they are experts, because they say so over their own signatures. They made a report in which they said it cost from 5 to 10 per cent more only, not 40 or 50 per cent, as is commonly understood and alleged as a reason for giving a subsidy to American ships. They said it cost from 5 to 10 per cent more only to operate an American ship as against a foreign ship. You can buy them free in the markets of the world to-day, and operate them in our commerce, except in our coastwise trade. You can buy a ship anywhere and do it.

"When this war broke out a number of American citizens had ships, which they were operating under the British or some other flag—mostly under the British flag. They were anxious to have the law changed to such an extent that those ships could be transferred or that they could buy ships and transfer them to American registry, and they asked us to support such a measure. We did support it, and the distinguished Senator from Ohio, if I am not mistaken, voted for it, and Senator Root voted for it, and nearly every Republican in Congress voted for that measure, which went promptly upon the statute books. These American shipowners did not want to transfer their ships from a belligerent flag to the American flag because they loved our flag; they transferred them because it saved them from possible capture by hostile cruisers. It may cost them a little more to operate them under the American flag, but they pay this for safety—for insurance.

"When we passed that law we put it in the hands of any American citizen to buy a ship of any belligerent flag and transfer it to American registry. We have given any citizen the power—a power that our opponents now hesitate to give to the President of the United States, who has not a motive on earth except to serve you and to keep this country out of trouble—we have given to any citizen a power that these gentlemen are unwilling to accord to the President of the United States under this shipping bill.

"You know that individuals, for self-interest or for some other reason, may collusively or in bad faith transfer a ship. They may transfer it to our registry for some purpose that is not square, that is not fair, and if they did the American Government has got to come to the front and make diplomatic representations in order to protect the man who does that, because his ship which we permitted to come under American registry flies our flag. We have got to make representations. So far as that transfer is bona fide it is recognized in international law as being a proper transfer. The burden of proof rests upon the man who effectuates that transfer to show in a prize court that it was bona fide. But the Government of the United States would have to intervene through diplomatic channels in each of such cases and see that its citizens and the ships under its flag got justice in that prize court.

"My friends, when the Republicans in Congress and the Democrats in Congress and the Progressives in Congress voted for this ship-registry bill, did they attach any condition to it that no American citizen or other person should transfer a vessel bearing the flag of a belligerent to American registry, unless we first got the consent of some foreign government? No, sir. And yet in the shipping bill, where we confer upon the President of the United States the power to determine whether any ship bearing a belligerent flag shall be bought, they say they are so afraid that he will do something to involve us in international difficulties that they can not trust him. They would rather surrender the vital American right to protect our own people than to trust the President of the United States, although they are willing to trust an individual.

"I speak with some diffidence about the President of the United States, gentlemen; I speak with diffidence because I have recently had the rare fortune to become a member of his family, and I would not speak of him to-day if it were not well known that the views I now express of him I entertained for years before I ever had any thought that any such great good could come to me. There is no man, if that power is intrusted to him, who will exercise it more wisely, who will exercise it more justly, who will exercise it with greater regard to the rights of every belligerent nation and every neutral nation, who will exercise it with greater fidelity to the interests of the people of this country and to the business men, the farmers, and producers of this country than the President of the United States. Can you trust him? Can you trust him in this shipping bill?

"Gentlemen, there is not an act that this shipping board can commit without the approval of the President of the United States; and more than that, let me say to you that when you talk about limiting or restricting the powers of the President of the United States with a view to preventing him from doing something that might imperil the peace of this country, let me ask you what you mean by conferring upon him the supreme powers of commander in chief of the Army and Navy of this Nation when, without consulting anybody, if he were not wise and prudent and just and honorable and peaceful, he could plunge this country into war in five minutes, and you could not say a word; and yet you hesitate to trust him to buy a few paltry ships for the protection of American commerce. It is not worthy of consideration.

"I want to call your attention to this fact: We all admit the necessity and we admit the opportunity. The report of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York admits the necessity and the opportunity. The report of your own chamber admits the necessity and the opportunity—the necessity for dealing with the emergency in the first place, and the opportunity for extending our trade in the second place. To the south of us lies the great southern continent, seeking to establish trade relations with us; seeking to strengthen our social relationship; seeking to extend its financial relationships in this country, and depending absolutely and wholly upon transportation to bring about those great results.

"If we do not give them transportation, gentlemen, what is the use of establishing branch banks in South America and expecting them to compete with English banks or German banks or any other banks? What is the use of our merchants trying to do business in that country if they have not the transportation? They must not only have transportation which will put them upon a parity with other nations in the matter of rates and quality of service, but also in the matter of time, because time is of the very essence of trade and commerce. You can not do business on a freight train when your competitor does it by express. If he does it by express, you have got to use the express or get out of the field. Is that not true? I ask you as business men if that is not true? South America does business with Europe on an express basis, while we do little business on any basis with South America.

"I am afraid I am exceeding my time very much, Mr. President, but I beg your indulgence for a moment or two more. I want to tell you what the ambassador of one of the greatest nations of South America said not long ago in a speech at Boston—Dr. Naon, a most able and distinguished diplomat, and one of the most progressive men from his own great southern continent. He said:

"Let us see, now, what practical method could be adopted for supplying these needs and increasing the amount of our international commerce. There can surely be no better authority in this regard than the official word of the Argentine Government as cabled some days ago to him who has the honor of addressing you at this moment. In this cablegram my Government says in brief:

"'Our products are being exported without increased difficulties, but a scarcity of bottoms is foreseen in the near future for the transportation of our products.'

"This speech was made last December. He continues:

"A very efficient means of overcoming the difficulty would be if vessels were to come from that country with the usual cargoes, namely, unrefined naphtha, woods, iron, machinery, and other agricultural implements, petroleum, furniture, lubricating oils, typewriters, machines, etc., these vessels would return with our products, such as refrigerated meats, wool, hides, quebracho, tannin, live stock, etc. American manufacturers could step into the place left by European industries in all branches formerly supplied by them, such as coal (Argentina depends wholly upon the imports of coal), steel rails, galvanized iron, wooden goods, pig and sheet iron, machinery in general, cement, locomotives, railroad cars, refined sugar, automobiles, galvanized iron or steel wire, rail joints, sheet zinc, cotton fabrics, printing paper, electric wire and cables, iron pipe of all kinds, manufactures of iron and steel, household articles, woolen clothing, etc. The present moment offers to manufacturers of such articles most advantageous opportunities for openings, taking advantage of the shutting down of the European markets.

"Then he goes on to speak of the difficulty of securing vessels, and he even goes so far as to say that the Argentine Government itself would be willing to cooperate with this Government in the establishment of suitable steamship lines to take this trade. He goes on to say that there are $100,000,000 of trade in Argentina seeking American treatment, and yet we are hesitating to do the thing that is necessary to make it possible for us to take it, and not only to take it but to keep it.

"Let me call your attention to the fact that the Panama Railroad & Steamship Line has been operated for 12 years by this Government under the supervision of the War Department. Here is a private corporation engaged in the steamship business and railroad business, the steamships running from the city of New York to the Isthmus, and running at a profit, and as well handled as any steamship company in this country or anywhere else, for that matter. The Panama Railroad & Steamship Co. is a private corporation, of which the Government owns the stock. The Government owns every share of that stock. Its directors are chosen by the Government. It is operated under the supervision of the War Department. The War Department does not make the rates on the Panama steamships. The War Department does not handle the details of operation. It selects a competent board of directors, such as any other private corporation has, and that board of directors selects experts to operate those ships, and they have been successfully operated for 12 years under the supervision of the War Department. We were put into that private steamship business by the Republican Party, and it is to their credit, and I give them credit for it, because it was a necessary and a desirable thing to do, both in the interest of American business and in the interest of the construction of the Panama Canal. The canal has been completed. What are you going to do with those ships? Are you going to give them away? Are you going to require the Panama Railroad Co. by act of the Congress to turn those ships over to the War Department or the Navy Department, to be used solely as reserves, at great expense to this Government, instead of keeping them occupied in trade, as every other intelligent nation does, so that they will not be an expense to the Government, but a profit, and so that we may have them ready for use as naval auxiliaries in time of war? Or are you going to say, 'No; we can not stay in this private business. It offends our every sentiment as the proper agency of government. We are going to get rid of this thing at any cost and get back to our hoary dogma and hug it to death'?

"My friends, where have American intelligence and courage gone? Have they deserted us? I do not believe it. We want to deal with these questions as practical and courageous men. We have to keep that steamship line going. Whether we pass this shipping bill or not, it must continue to be operated in the interest of American commerce throughout Central and South America. The rates of freight have always been reasonable, and I will venture to say that during this period, when extortion has been practiced with a high hand upon American commerce, the Panama Steamship Co. has not raised a single rate an iota of a cent.

"We have been in private business in a great many directions. We have recently passed the Alaskan bill to build a railroad in Alaska. Why did we do that? Because private capital will not develop that great Territory, a Territory whose development is necessary in the interest of the commerce of this great country. We are more justified in going into a Territory for a development of this kind than into a State, because the Territory is the common property of the people of the United States and it is essentially a national function that we should develop it, if we can not get private capital to do it upon reasonable terms.

"You have to make up your minds to one of two things: You either have to let the Government organize this shipping corporation and let it take care of American commerce and protect you, or do nothing to protect the commerce you now have. Recently German submarines have appeared in the English Channel, and even off the coast of Ireland, sinking British merchantmen in which your cargoes are being carried, and that menace is likely to continue longer and grow more dangerous. The only protection to your commerce is to put the American flag upon these ships.

"You have either to adopt this shipping bill or you can do nothing except sit still and submit to robbery and the jeopardy of war. Which will you choose? The Democratic Party can not under its platform adopt any plan involving a subsidy. It is useless to talk about it. You could not get within a thousand miles of a bill that contained a subsidy, so far as the Democratic Party is concerned, and as it has power in both branches of Congress, the only alternative is to continue your commerce under foreign flags, subject to all of the incidents and hazards of war, or to adopt this bill.

"Your committee makes a suggestion to the dangers of which I wish to call your attention. They propose that a Federal shipping board be organized; we do it under this bill. They propose that our navigation laws and regulations be altered; the bill provides for that. However, the point of difference is that they propose that the Government shall organize a marine development company in which the Government shall be the sole stockholder, and that this marine development company shall engage in the business of guaranteeing mortgages issued by private corporations; and this same suggestion emanates from the city of New York. My friends, where are we going; whither are we tending? A proposition of that character from the ctiy of New York! The mortgage companies in the city of New York—the private business of guaranteeing the mortgages of corporations or of individuals upon real estate or anything else—you propose to put the Government into competition with, in the most private kind of private business. You also ask us under this plan to have the Government make direct loans to shipping corporations or shipping firms. Do you know what that means? It means that the Government must lend money direct to anybody. There never was a more dangerous experiment or expedient on the face of the earth that could be adopted, and I do not believe any American business man or any intelligent American, if he will study the question for 15 minutes, will stand for it a single second.

"Last fall, when the conditions in the South were so grave and so serious, the price of cotton was down to 5 cents a pound, and a great disaster confronted the southern people. We were asked to sanction the issue of $250,000,000 of greenbacks or the sale of $250,000,000 of Government bonds to put that money into the Treasury of this Government and to lend it to farmers upon their cotton. I had to stand against it, although I am from the South—and I hated to do it, gentlemen, so far as the effect was concerned; but I could not, as the representative of this Government, standing on guard at the doors of the Treasury of the United States, advocate any such action. Once you adopt this plan and put the seal and the sanction of the sound business men of America—you sound business men who represent every section of this country—upon a proposition to lend Government money direct to any corporation or any individual, you might as well take the doors down from the National Treasury and involve the entire credit of this Government, because, I tell you, it will be extended everywhere.

"Let me give you an instance of what has happened. In 1837 we had $38,000,000 surplus in the Federal Treasury. It was during Mr. Van Buren's administration. We were so concerned about that surplus, it was so much money, that there was a great 'row' in Congress to know what to do with it. They did not know what to do with so much money. It became a political question. They finally voted to lend it to the States. You would think that the credit of the States and their obligations to pay were the most reliable assets you could possibly have. I mean, you would think that such obligations were the safest investments you could possibly have. Congress passed a resolution to distribute that money among the States and take back their demand obligations. To-day the Treasury of the United States holds $28,000,000 of the demand obligations of the richest States in this Union—New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, Georgia, Alabama, Tennessee—every State that was in the Union at that time. We have those demand obligations in the Treasury of the United States to-day, money loaned by this Government to these States. What happened? After we had given them $28,000,000 a panic struck the land. The act directed that the money be distributed to them in four installments. After the first three had been paid a panic swept the land and the Secretary of the Treasury, the National Treasury being in need of these funds, called upon the different States to pay back, and the representatives of all of these States in Congress passed a resolution, which is on the statute books to-day, preventing the Secretary of the Treasury from collecting these debts until further directed by Congress. The Secretary can not move a peg to collect that money, because they put this inhibition upon the statute books:

"Until further directed by the Congress, the Secretary of the Treasury shall not call these loans.

"Yet, gentlemen, when we can not get a State of the American Union to pay its just debts to the Government for money loaned to it, you ask us to stand for a proposition to lend money to private corporations or individuals upon the security of mortgages.

"Never on the face of the earth; and I tell you, gentlemen, if you ever enter upon it, you will have to lend it upon railroads and every other enterprise. Bills are referred to me asking that every conceivable sort of scheme be approved, submitting them for the judgment of the department, for raids upon the United States Treasury in the form of actual loans to be made by the Treasury of the United States on this thing and that thing—farm loans, loans upon houses built by workingmen, and so on. They are all entitled to consideration if we are going into the money-lending business. We will have to lend it to everybody. You can not discriminate under our system of government. Everybody must tap the Treasury till if you adopt any such resolution as this.

"There are many things that I wish I could say to you, but I am trenching upon the time of the distinguished Senator from Ohio. I want to thank you heartily for the courtesy you have extended to me, and to thank you all for the opportunity you have given me to speak to you, and for the very patient hearing you have accorded me."

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I ask leave to insert in the RECORD an editorial on "Government-owned merchant ships," appearing in La Follette's Magazine, signed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

GOVERNMENT-OWNED MERCHANT SHIPS.

The bill for Government-owned ships to aid in carrying our products to foreign markets has been buried under a mass of bitter partisan discussion. This has been cleverly managed by Republican Senators who are hostile to public ownership of any public utility.

One after another they have pounced upon the President and the policies of his administration with a fury calculated to fire party feeling and carry some Republican Senators of progressive tendencies into opposition to the bill as an administration measure.

Hence day after day the bill is ignored, while the tariff and currency, the war tax and business depression, idle mills and idle men, the President's Indianapolis speech, his "hostility to business manifested in legislation," his "surrender to monopoly in naming captains of finance and industry to administer the laws enacted to regulate monopoly"—these have furnished the principal subjects for discussion and for slashing criticism in the long hours of this filibustering debate.

A few statesmen of the archaic type have spoken against the bill. No one listened, and no one will ever read their speeches. For the most part they were the product of another age. It was almost pathetic to witness their efforts as they stolidly toiled through masses of worn-out arguments and obsolete "facts" against Government ownership and operation of public utilities. But at least these "elder statesmen" had the merit of frankness and sincerity in opposing the bill.

But mark the course of their more astute colleagues. I speak now of those distinguished opponents of the bill who with superior skill and cunning spent little time arguing against Government ownership, but with a great show of mingled wisdom and mystery, in throaty and awe-inspiring whispers, admonish us to beware of war! war! war!

It was just before the beginning of the debate on this bill that these same Senators were arraigning the President for his Mexican policy of "watchful waiting." It was stigmatized as puerile and cowardly. The echoes of their censure have scarcely died within our ears. It seems but yesterday that they were denouncing the President because he would not make war on Mexico, to protect the dear property rights of big American business. And to-day these same Senators profess to believe and would have the country believe that back under cover, behind this bill, the President has some dark and sinister plan to force a war with the allies.

If war is lurking anywhere in this proceeding, it must be behind the bill. It is not written in its terms. It can not be found within its four corners.

Ah, but say these suspicious gentlemen, this bill by its terms gives the Government the right to buy vessels as well as to build vessels in which to carry our products to the waiting foreign markets. Now many merchant vessels owned by German companies have taken refuge in our harbors. As Great Britain commands the sea, they can not escape capture were they to venture forth while the war is on. Naturally the German owners desire to sell such vessels.

For 125 years the United States has maintained the doctrine that a citizen of a neutral nation has the right to buy merchant vessels, as he has the right to buy merchandise, of the citizens of any country in time of war as in time of peace; that this is a sovereign right which inheres in every government in conducting its commerce, and, as asserted by Caleb Cushing, Attorney General in 1854, in this we have the support of the authoritative writers on the public law of Europe.

The decisions of our Supreme Court, the opinions of American jurists, and the policy of our Department of State have uniformly sustained this contention. It is an invaluable commercial right, and the administration that surrendered it would be justly denounced as cowardly and un-American.

To maintain this sovereign right on principle is one thing. To wantonly and unnecessarily provoke a controversy regarding it at a time or under conditions which would involve us in serious foreign complications is quite another thing.

Great Britain has always maintained the same view of this sovereign right that our Government has adhered to. But it is now to her interest to take the other side, and she promptly does so. She now asserts that she will contest our right to purchase any interned German merchantmen.

Such a contest, if one were to arise, would go first to an English prize court. If her court were to reverse its former decisions and sustain her foreign office in its new contention, the matter would then become a subject for diplomatic correspondence. If not adjusted by departmental agencies of the two Governments, we would then demand that it be submitted to arbitration, as we have the right to do under our arbitration treaty with Great Britain. It will be seen, therefore, that there is a peaceful and orderly way in which any controversy that might occur would be settled.

It should be stated that Senator ROOT, of New York, advanced the contention early in this debate that our rights as a neutral to purchase the interned vessels of a belligerent were surrendered by article 56 of the Declaration of London This declaration is a draft of rules and regulations for the government of an international prize court. It was framed by a convention of delegates representing the participating Governments which assembled in London in 1908. The claim made by Senator ROOT was shown to be without any foundation whatever by Senator WALSH, whose able argument exposed the entire subject, first, because the convention "was never ratified by Great Britain, and as the ratifications of those powers which indorsed the work of their delegates have never been exchanged, it has not become obligatory as a treaty"; second, the representatives of Great Britain who participated in the London conference, in their report to Lord Grey themselves construed article 56 as "in accord with the rules hitherto enforced by British prize courts." They further stated specifically regarding the transfer of the vessels of belligerents to a neutral that "transfers effected after the outbreak of hostilities are good if made bona fide." Furthermore, Great Britain has issued three proclamations since the beginning of the European war giving notice that she would not be bound by the terms of the London declaration as to many of its important provisions. In this proclamation she has been followed by the allies. As stated by Senator WALSH, "it is accordingly idle to assert that the declaration of London, so contemptuously treated by the allies, can be appealed to by them in justification of any course they may take in the present war, or even that it can justly have any persuasive force in the ultimate determination of our right to purchase the interned ships."

No claim for the London declaration has been advanced since Senator WALSH made his argument.

Our right as a neutral government stands, therefore, as established and maintained in many notable contests. Naturally, President Wilson's administration can not assume the responsibility of surrendering a right which has been sustained by the opinions of our ablest jurists, an unbroken line of decisions by our courts, and the uniform policy of the Department of State declared by such eminent authorities as Secretaries Marcy, Cass, Fish, and Evarts

Wilson will not plunge this country into war. At the head of a Nation that stands for peace, he has guarded our neutrality with noble care. He has been first to anticipate possible trouble, and quick to speak the word of admonition to avert it. With almost the first clash of the great conflict came his solemn appeal to the people to refrain from any act or utterance which might inflame partisan feelings. Mark his words:

"The United States must be neutral in fact as well as in name during these days that are to try men's souls."

And again, I feel sure it is the earnest wish and purpose of every thoughtful American that this great country of ours, which is, of course, the first in our thoughts and in our hearts, should show herself in this time of peculiar trial a Nation fit beyond others to exhibit the fine poise of undisturbed judgment, the dignity of self-control, the efficiency of dispassionate action; a Nation that neither sits in judgment upon others nor is disturbed in her own counsel, and which keeps herself fit and free to do what is honest and disinterested and truly serviceable for the peace of the world.

This hue and cry about the purchase of German ships plunging us into war with Great Britain lacks sincerity. President Wilson will not, for the saving of a few thousand dollars in the purchase of a ship, hazard the awful cost of war. He will permit nothing to be done that will in any way disturb conditions of neutrality, and it is unnecessary by congressional action to sacrifice our long-established right of a neutral to buy merchantmen or merchandize of a belligerent. It is an insult to propose that President Wilson should give bond to keep the national peace.

These clever opponents of this bill have at heart no fear that the administration will involve us in war with any foreign power. They know better than that. But that the Government will make war upon the Shipping Trust—that is their real fear!

ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m., Tuesday, February 16, 1915) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 17, 1915, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 16, 1915.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Bring us, O God, our heavenly Father, as a fitting preparation for the duties of the hour, into oneness with Thee, that we may think right, act right toward Thee and our fellow men, which is salvation. The kingdom of heaven now, with all its uplifting power, removes all doubt, all uncertainties, and makes life sublime.

"Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you and learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart, and ye shall find rest unto your souls, for my yoke is easy and my burden is light."

Hear our prayer and help us to answer it. In the spirit of the world's great Exemplar. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 17869) providing for the appointment of an additional district judge for the southern district of the State of Georgia, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the President of the Senate has canceled his signature to the enrolled bill (S. 7555) to authorize the construction of a bridge across Suwanee River, in the State of Florida.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, to-morrow is Calendar Wednesday. I think we need the day on appropriation bills. I understand the purpose of the Committee on Rules is to present a rule this morning and dispose of the shipping bill before adjournment to-night, but I think it is necessary to move along with the appropriation bills, and I therefore desire to ask unanimous consent that Calendar Wednesday be dispensed with to-morrow, and that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks unanimous consent that the Calendar Wednesday business to-morrow be dispensed with. Is there objection;

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I believe the bill making appropriations to pay pensions is the unfinished business, and would naturally come up to-day unless displaced by order of the House?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes. I understand it will be displaced to-day; that is, if a majority is in favor of doing so, which I think is the case.

Mr. MANN. Well, if there is such a rush about appropriation bills, why not take up the pension appropriation bill and pass it to-day? That is a very important bill to the pensioners of the country.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is an important piece of legislation, but the majority has determined to pass another bill to-day.

Mr. MANN. Well, if the majority is determined to set aside the most important appropriation bill there is, we will have to wait until we see what is done before we dispense with Calendar Wednesday. For the present I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects. Does the gentleman from Alabama want his other request put or not?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No. If Calendar Wednesday is not dispensed with, I do not desire to make the other request.

PENSIONS.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table three Senate pension bills—S. 6980, S. 7213, and S. 7402—the Senate having disagreed to the House amendments, and asked for a conference. I move that the conferees be appointed on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House three Senate pension bills, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 6980. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 7213. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

S. 7402. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] asks unanimous consent to agree to the conference requested by the Senate on these three bills. Is there objection?

There was no objection; and the Speaker announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. RUSSELL, Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin, and Mr. LANGLEY.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, being in charge of the pension appropriation bill, which would naturally come up this morning as unfinished business, I do not desire to interfere with the purposes of the majority, although it is an important bill and I should like to go on with it in conformity with the general purpose of getting rid of the appropriation bills. But it having been determined in a Democratic caucus last night to consider other business, however much I may agree or disagree with the action on that matter, I do not feel that it would be my duty now to present a motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union upon that bill. I want to make this statement in order that it may be known why I do not, being in charge of that bill, now make the motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. BARTLETT. In one moment; that is, if the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], the chairman of the Committee on Rules, is ready to present a rule for the consideration of another bill.

Mr. HENRY. I am ready now.

Mr. BARTLETT. Now I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if the special rule should be offered by the Committee on Rules and the House should not agree to that rule, would the gentleman then move to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the pension appropriation bill?

Mr. BARTLETT. I would. That would be my duty, as the gentleman understands, and I would undertake to carry it out.

Mr. MANN. I understood it, but I would like to have the RECORD show.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman knows I would, and I would.

PURCHASE OF SHIPS.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 736 (H. Rept. 1410).

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the Committee on Naval Affairs shall be discharged from further consideration of S. 5259 and the House shall proceed immediately to the consideration of same There shall be not exceeding six hours' general debate on the bill, one half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] and the other half by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE]. That it shall be in order to offer the following amendments only, which may be offered during the general debate and considered as pending, to wit: Page 1, line 3, after the word "that," insert "with the approval of the President"; in line 5, page 2, strike out the word "shall" and substitute the word "to"; at the end of the bill add new sections, as follows:

"SEC. 5. That the United States, acting through the shipping board hereinafter created, may subscribe to the capital stock of a corporation of the District of Columbia. Said corporation shall have for its object the purchase, construction, equipment, maintenance, and operation of merchant vessels to meet the requirements of the foreign commerce of the United States, or to charter vessels for such purposes, and to make charters or leases of any vessel or vessels owned by such corporation to any other corporation organized under the laws of a State, a majority of the stock being owned by citizens of the United States, firm or individual, citizen or citizens of the United States, to be used for such purposes, and shall have power to carry out said objects and purposes: Provided, That the terms and conditions of such charter parties shall first be approved by the shipping board, the initial capital stock of which corporation shall not be over $10,000,000, of the par value of $100 per share: And provided further, That said corporation shall make no charter or lease of any vessel to any corporation, firm, or individual for a longer period than 12 months, and said corporation shall specify in the charter or lease the rates, charges, and fares to be observed by such corporation, firm, or individual chartering or leasing any such vessel or vessels as a maximum to be charged during the life of such charter or lease, and there shall be contained in said charter or lease a provision terminating the same whenever the charterer or the lessee shall violate any of its provisions. It is hereby made the duty of such corporation to take such steps as may be necessary to terminate any such charter or lease whenever the corporation, firm, or individual party to such charter or lease shall violate the provisions of the same.

"The members of said shipping board, as incorporators, may, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act, form a corporation of the District of Columbia, by making and filing a certificate of incorporation, as provided in subchapter 4 of chapter 18 of an act entitled 'An act to establish a code of laws for the District of Columbia,' approved March 3, 1901.

"The corporation so formed, its officers and trustees and stockholders, shall possess all the powers conferred and perform all the duties imposed by said subchapter 4, except as the same are by this act limited or qualified.

"The powers of said corporation shall be limited to the purposes of this act and to such as are necessarily incident thereto.

"Said corporation may sue and be sued in any district court of the United States, and may remove to said courts any cause brought against it in any other court.

"Said corporation may require any officer or employee to give security for the faithful performance of his duties.

"Persons subscribing to the stock of said company shall pay for the same in full at the time of subscription.

"The stock owned by the United States shall be voted by the shipping board or its duly selected representative.

"The officers and trustees of said corporation shall be citizens of the United States, but need not be citizens of the District of Columbia. Such officers and trustees shall be subject to removal at any time by vote of a majority of the stock at any meeting thereof.

"Said corporation and its capital stock shall, so long as the United States owns a majority of said stock, be free from all public taxes.

"At no time shall less than 51 per cent of the stock of said corporation be held by the United States unless the United States shall dispose of all of its stock.

"Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

"SEC. 6. That the United States shall subscribe to 51 per cent of the initial capital stock of such corporation at par and the remainder thereof may be offered for public subscription at not less than par, and the United States may then further subscribe at par for any amount of such stock not taken by public subscription, but the shipping board may cause such corporation to begin business as soon as 51 per cent of such stock has been subscribed and paid for by the United States. The shipping board, with the approval of the President, may consent to or may cause an increase of the capital stock from time to time as the interests of the corporation may require, but without authority of Congress the portion of such increase to be paid for by the United States shall not exceed $10,000,000, neither shall the proportion of stock held by the United States at any time be less than 51 per cent: Provided, That a sufficient number of the shares of stock of said corporation shall be set apart for holding by the persons for whom the stock of the United States may be voted as trustees, and such shares shall be issued or transferred to such persons to qualify them as trustees of such corporation, and such shares shall be transferred to the successor or successors of any such person or persons.

"SEC. 7. That the United States, through the shipping board and with the approval of the President, is authorized to purchase or construct vessels suitable in the judgment of the shipping board for the purposes of such corporation with a view to transferring them to such corporation, and for this purpose the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the request of the shipping board and the approval of the President, may issue and sell or use for such purchases or construction any of the bonds of the United States now available in the Treasury of the United States under the act of August 5, 1909, the act of February 4, 1910, and the act of March 2, 1911, relating to the issue of bonds for the construction of the Panama Canal, to a total amount not to exceed $30,000,000, for the purpose of purchasing or constructing such vessels: Provided, That any Panama Canal bonds issued and sold or used under the provisions of this section or other existing authority may be made payable at such time after issue as the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, may deem advisable and fix, instead of 50 years after date of issue, as in said act of August 5, 1909, not exceeding 50 years: Provided further, That payments for such purchases or construction from the proceeds of sales of bonds, or delivery of bonds in payment thereof, shall be made only as ordered and directed by the shipping board: And provided further, That in making purchases of ships during the continuance of the present European war no purchases shall be made in a way which will disturb the conditions of neutrality.

"SEC. 8. That the shipping board is authorized to transfer the vessels purchased or constructed as herein provided to any such corporation in which the United States has become a stockholder as hereinbefore provided, and such corporation shall issue to the United States in payment thereof its gold bonds, bearing interest at not less than 4 per cent per annum, and upon such further terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the shipping board, such bonds to be secured by a first-mortgage lien upon such vessels, severally, thus transferred: Provided, That the amount of bonds received by the United States in payment for such vessels shall not be less, at the then par value, than the total amount expended by the United States in the purchase or construction of such vessels, and the same may be sold by the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, and with the approval of the President, to reimburse the Treasury for expenditures made in the purchase or construction of vessels: And provided further, That said corporation shall not issue any bonds in excess of $40,000,000, or incur any liabilities other than stock issues in excess of $10,000,000. Such corporation shall make suitable provision for sinking fund and for the depreciation charges under the rules and regulations to be prescribed by such shipping board; and all vessels acquired under this act, or in which the United States shall otherwise be interested as owner, in whole or in part, or upon which the United States shall have or hold any mortgage, pledge, lien, or other security, shall, when and while employed solely as merchant vessels, be in all respects subject to all laws, regulations, and liabilities governing merchant vessels in like manner and to the same extent as merchant vessels in private ownership when duly registered under the laws of the United States.

"All rules and regulations relating to or which affect shipping, navigation, or water-borne commerce of the United States heretofore made or published by authority of law shall only be and remain in force until midnight on the 31st day of December, 1915, and by proclamation of the President shall cease to have any force or validity at any prior date when new shipping rules and regulations shall, as provided hereby, take the place of those now in existence.

"The shipping board herein provided for shall propose such rules and regulations applicable to the shipping and water-borne commerce of the United States, in lieu of those now in force and covering matters of like character, as they may determine suited to the present needs of such shipping and commerce, which, when approved by the President and published, shall apply and become of full force and effect, in lieu of such rules and regulations as are now applicable thereto. In the rules and regulations hereby authorized to be adopted and put into force different classes of shipping, navigation, and water-borne commerce may be appropriately and differently treated and provided for. Such rules and regulations when promulgated may be modified, changed, or amended by the shipping board.

"SEC. 9. That vessels purchased or constructed by such shipping board and conveyed to such corporation as herein provided shall be entitled to registry under the laws of the United States, and shall be deemed vessels of the United States and entitled to the benefits and privileges appertaining to such vessels, except such vessels shall engage only in trade with foreign countries or with Alaska, the Philippine Islands, the Hawaiian Islands, and the islands of Porto Rico, Guam, and Tutuila: Provided, That the above restrictions shall not apply to such of said vessels as are built in the United States. Such vessels shall be subject to the navigation laws of the United States, except as herein provided.

"SEC. 10. That the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Commerce, and three additional members, two of whom shall be of practical experience in the management and operation of steamships in the foreign trade, are hereby constituted a board to be known as the shipping board, with full power, subject to the approval of the President, to vote the stock of the United States in said corporation, either as a body or by one or more of its members duly authorized by a majority, and to do all things necessary, whether specifically enumerated or not, to carry out the purposes of this act and protect the interests of the United States, said three additional members to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The salary of each of the three additional members of said board so appointed shall be $6,000 per annum.

"SEC. 11. That, with the approval of the Congress, such shipping board may at any time sell the stock of such corporation owned by the United States.

"SEC. 12. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to charter, lease, or transfer such naval auxiliaries belonging to the Naval Establishment of the United States as are suitable for commercial use, and which are not required for use in the Navy in time of peace; and vessels belonging to the War Department suitable for commercial uses and not required for military transports in time of peace; and to direct or cause to be chartered, leased, or transferred vessels now owned and operated by the Panama Railroad Co., to any corporation now or hereafter organized as in this act provided, upon such terms and conditions as the shipping board, with the approval of the President of the United States, shall prescribe. The vessels purchased or constructed by the United States through the shipping board, with the approval of the President of the United States, shall be of a type, as far as the commercial requirements of the foreign trade of the United States may permit, suitable for use as naval auxiliaries in the Naval Establishment of the United States.

"SEC. 13. That the President of the United States, upon giving to any such corporation in which the United States shall be a stockholder, through its president, vice president, secretary, or manager, notice in writing for such reasonable length of time as in his judgment the circumstances require and will permit of his intention so to do, may take possession, absolutely or temporarily for use as naval auxiliaries of any vessel or vessels owned or leased by or otherwise in the possession of said corporation, and said corporation shall be entitled to a reasonable price or rental therefor, to be fixed by the shipping board, with the approval of the President: Provided, That if in the judgment of the President an emergency exists requiring such action he may take possession of any such vessel or vessels without notice.

"SEC. 14. That the shipping board shall make to Congress, at the beginning of each regular session, a report of expenditures and receipts under this act and of the operations of any corporation in which the United States may have become a stockholder hereunder.

"SEC. 15. That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000,000, or, in lieu of such appropriation, the Secretary of the Treasury may sell Panama Canal bonds to the amount of $10,000,000 in addition to those provided for in section 7, and on the same terms, and set apart and use the proceeds thereof for such purposes.

"SEC. 16. That two years from and after the conclusion of the present European war, that fact to be determined by the President, the corporation and the shipping board shall turn over and transfer all vessels purchased or constructed under the provisions of this act to the Navy Department, and the Secretary of the Navy shall have the right, with the approval of the President, to lease or charter any of such vessels not needed for naval or military purposes to any firm, individual, or corporation for use as merchant vessels.

"That the Secretary of the Navy shall in such leases provide for their cancellation whenever such vessels may be required for naval or military purposes.

"That all leases made under this section of the act shall be subject to all of the provisions of section 5 of this act relating to maximum rates and charges and terms and conditions of forfeiture.

"That when the vessels, land, piers, leases for land or piers, and other property held by the corporation are disposed of as herein provided the corporation herein provided for shall be dissolved and said shipping board abolished.

"SEC. 17. That sections 1, 2, 3, and 4 of this act shall not take effect until two years from and after the conclusion of the present European war, that fact to be determined by the President."

At the conclusion of the general debate the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the amendment and the bill and vote shall be had upon the final passage of the bill without other intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is entitled to 20 minutes.

Mr. HENRY. I am entitled to an hour.

The SPEAKER. That is correct.

Mr. MANN. Before the debate begins, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HENRY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I notice the last paragraph of the rule provides that the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the "amendment," while the first paragraph of the rule provides for offering certain "amendments."

Mr. HENRY. It should be "amendments" in the last paragraph. I will ask that the letter "s" be added to it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to amend by adding the letter "s."

Mr. HENRY. It is a typographical error.

Mr. MANN. In line 6, page 13.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. I should like to inquire whether the Speaker in construing this rule will hold that the bill is to be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it so states somewhere in the rule.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have not been able to find it.

Mr. HENRY. I suggest that the construction of the rule will come up after it is adopted.

The SPEAKER. That is true.

Mr. BARTLETT. Of course I do not want——

The SPEAKER. It is perfectly proper for the gentleman to make the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HENRY. The rule reads that—

The House shall proceed to consider.

Mr. BARTLETT. I am perfectly willing to pretermit the question.

The SPEAKER. Where is that provision?

Mr. HENRY. In line 3 of the first section.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of the opinion from the verbiage of this rule that it would be considered in the ordinary way.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is what I was going to suggest.

The SPEAKER. That is, that the House would resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BARTLETT. That is the reason I ask the question, because unless otherwise specifically provided for the rules of the House require that all bills making appropriations shall be considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and it is to be presumed that if the committee intended that the bill should be considered in the House instead of in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union they would have so stated.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman is entirely correct about that.

Mr. HENRY. Of course I have no objection to it being modified to that extent.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman wishes to ask for that modification, he can do so; and if he does not want to do so, he does not have to.

Mr. HENRY. It makes no difference. I suppose gentlemen on the other side do not desire more than 20 minutes on this rule.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman from Texas is mistaken. We would like to have a little more time than that.

Mr. HENRY. How much time would you like?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I really have requests for much more time than I have the face to ask for.

Mr. HENRY. I think the rule is so liberal that you should not ask much.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I think we can get on with an hour on this side.

Mr. HENRY. I think 30 minutes on a side ought to be an abundance of time, and I suggest, if the gentleman is willing to take 30 minutes, that I will yield him 30 minutes of my hour; and I suggest that we agree that at the end of that time the previous question be considered as ordered on the resolution.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman move the previous question at the end of the hour?

Mr. HENRY. I hardly think it is necessary to do that. I think the gentleman might agree that we should order the previous question.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It will be impossible to secure unanimous consent to have the previous question ordered.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I wish the gentleman to have an abundance of time; but it seems to me that 30 minutes on a side are sufficient. This matter has been thoroughly discussed.

Mr. MADDEN. Where?

Mr. HENRY. In various quarters.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The 30 minutes will be satisfactory, but I shall ask that the gentleman move the previous question at the close of the debate.

Mr. HENRY. I ask unanimous consent that the previous question be considered as ordered at the end of one hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that at the end of one hour's debate on this rule the previous question shall be considered as ordered.

Mr. MURDOCK. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. MANN. I will object.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The question was taken on ordering the previous question, and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Division, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 181, nays 126, answered "present" 4, not voting 112, as follows:

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall listening when his name should have been called?

Mr. FALCONER. No, sir; I was at the telephone booth.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not bring himself within the rule.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be recorded.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall listening when his name should have been called?

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. I was not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not vote.

Mr. GILL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall listening when his name should have been called?

Mr. GILL. I was not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not bring himself within the rule.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be recorded.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall listening when his name should have been called?

Mr. BUCHANAN of Texas. No, sir; I was in the cloakroom.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not vote.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, there is nothing that I can say at the present time more than is contained in the rule. I think we all understand the rule. Its language is as plain as it can be, and we understand the object of it. There is no need of my taking up the time of the House, and therefore I shall for the present yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, next year is election year. It has been quite noticeable of late that the nearer we approach the coming election the greater becomes the abuse of the President. He is denounced by partisan press as only a criminal ought to be denounced. What has he done? Has he deserved all this partisan abuse? Has he deserved any of it? Let us see. He has urged the passage of several great reform measures. He urged tariff revision. He urged currency reform. He urged the measure defining more clearly our antitrust laws. He urged the trade-commission bill. All of these great measures have now become the law of the land.

There is one significant fact about the passage of these bills which should not be forgotten. While there is a large Democratic majority in this Chamber and a working majority in the other Chamber, all of the measures which the President has recommended would have passed both bodies if we had had no majority at all.

If our membership in this Chamber had been just half instead of two to one, we would nevertheless have passed all of the measures President Wilson has urged. Yet he is denounced as a dictator and political tyrant by the Republican press, and we who vote for these administration measures are called automatons who sit here with no views or convictions of our own, simply carrying out the wishes of the President.

It seems, Mr. Speaker, in this day and time a man to be independent, to be credited with having convictions of his own, must vote against the President. No matter what your convictions are, if you vote with the President you are merely obeying orders. To be an independent American Representative, you must be against the President.

Mr. Speaker, there must be something more than the presidential will behind these measures. I can understand how his influence might affect a Democrat, but I can not understand why so many Republicans and Progressives support these measures unless there is real merit in them, and on every occasion we have received sufficient Republican or Progressive votes to pass every one of the measures if the two Chambers had been equally divided between two parties.

Mr. Speaker, we will hear the caucus held last night denounced. Why? We stood by the President.

The enemies of the President hoped we would break up in a row. If we had done that, our popularity among the President's enemies would have been great indeed. Oh, what splendid men we would have been if we had repudiated the President! For my part I do not want that kind of popularity. God knows if I thought the President was wrong I would not go with him. The trouble with me is I can not help thinking he is right upon these measures, and if I did not go with him under those circumstances I would not be fit to sit in this Chamber.

Oh, Mr. Speaker, it is amazing to what extent men will go to win a party victory.

Here is this man in the White House working, striving, for what—for some special interest? Oh, no; not that. There is not a political enemy of the President in this Chamber who will rise in his seat now and say that he believes any but the purest motives prompt Mr. Wilson in all he has done or is trying to do.

What will be the fate of this bill? Why is it Mr. Wilson wants us to pass it? Freight rates are prohibitively high and cargoes of American goods, the products of our farms and factories, await shipment. Those cargoes will not be sent abroad at all if this bill does not pass unless somebody pays a tremendous freight rate. The President says there is a very practical remedy—the passage of this bill. For my part I am proud of the chance to help, and I do not care the snap of my finger what anybody says. I believe the President is right, and when I vote with him I believe I am doing what is best for the American people.

The President has at his disposal the great army of Government patronage. Nobody has charged that he has offered to punish any man who has differed from him. He could use the patronage ax. It has been used, but that is not the Wilson way of doing things. He has influence which extends beyond his own party. He carries not only his own party but part of both the other parties, and he does it without threat of any kind.

It must be he is right. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is the secret of the President's success. He is trying to serve the American people. And when the record of his administration is made up, thank God, it will not be passed upon by any partisan jury, but by free American voters.

Republicans who are willing to be unfair may talk about our secret caucus; you may denounce the President because he is not of your party; you may criticize your colleagues in this Chamber because we will not break with the President; but, after all, these measures will be passed upon by the jury of American voters, and the President and those who stand with him with perfect confidence await their verdict. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, this rule will be adopted by this House, although a majority of the membership of this House is against the rule. The bill to which the rule relates will be passed by this House before we adjourn to-night, although a majority of the membership of the House is against the bill. I make that deliberate statement, that if the majority of this House were free to record their convictions upon the merits of the bill, it would be defeated before we adjourn to-night. [Applause on the Republican side.] The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] has just said that we will denounce the caucus and denounce this bill as the work of a secret caucus. You will hear no one on this side of the aisle denouncing this bill as the work of a secret caucus. You held a caucus last night, but you made only one slight amendment to the bill. This bill was not the work of a secret caucus, it was not the work of any committee of this House, it was not the work of the membership of this House. This bill, sir, is the product of the President of the United States [applause and cheers on the Democratic side], and your caucus was not held for the purpose of considering this bill, but to carry out the orders of the captain of your team. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the time will come when you will understand that whenever the captain of a team undertakes to order every move that shall be made by the members of the team, at the end of the season that team will always find itself the tail-ender of the league. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

What is this proposition? A rule comes in this morning to discharge a committee that has never considered the bill and make that bill in order. The Committee on Rules undertakes further to attach as an amendment a proposition that has never been introduced in the House of Representatives. They have attached a proposition to the bill that has been introduced in the Senate of the United States, but which has never been considered by any committee in that body. Oh, you ought to be proud of your method of legislating.

The Washington Herald this morning undertakes to quote from a speech that the distinguished Speaker of this House made to the caucus last night. Mr. Speaker, you are reported as saying:

> The President wants this bill—
> And that is all you are considering—
> The President wants this bill, and it is probably as good a bill as could be framed, even if we delayed matters. I am opposed to Government ownership, but this is an emergency measure. The House should do everything possible to expedite action and avoid an extra session. If there is an extra session the Democratic Party will be wiped off the face of the earth at the next election.
> [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

For your judgment, sir, as to the result of an extra session, I have the profoundest respect. [Laughter and applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND].

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, the great complaint that our opponents have against this Congress and this administration has been that it has not shown the lack of efficiency that they predicted it would show, and for some reason or other they are utterly unable to get over that particular complaint. If the Democratic Party had shown the lack of efficiency and the lack of power to grasp the great public questions and emergencies of this administration, they would have denounced it with the time-honored and threadbare denunciation that they have used on the stump. But the fact that the Democratic majority in this House can work in harmony with the Democratic President and a Democratic administration to accomplish the great economic good of the American people seems to sit pretty ill upon their stomachs.

No attempt has been made to jam this bill through this House, and no attempt will be made to jam this bill through this Congress. [Laughter on the Republican side.] This bill has been carefully considered [laughter on the Republican side]—yes; this bill has been given as careful consideration as any measure before the American Congress. It has attracted as widespread public attention, it has been debated by as many experts and as much light has been thrown on this economic measure as upon any measure that ever came before Congress, and it is simple in its characteristics. Except for the question of detail, the question is purely and simply whether the Government will establish the mercantile marine in the face of an emergency in this country. All else is a matter of machinery and detail.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Does not the bill provide that within two years after the cessation of the European war these ships shall all be disposed of, and we shall go out of the business entirely?

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, this bill will be explained by gentlemen who are more familiar with it than I, but I can say in the limited time that I have that the bill provides in effect that for two years the shipping board shall buy and acquire ships, charter and lease them under the shipping board, and at the end of two years after the cessation of the European war the ships shall be turned over to the permanent operating agency, which is the Navy Department itself.. In brief, that is the bill. The ship board itself is a temporary matter, coming to an end altogether by proclamation of the President two years after the end of the European war. At that time these ships become auxiliaries of the Navy and are turned over to the Secretary of the Navy. The proposition is simple, and the American people are asking action on this matter. It has been debated now week after week, and practically month after month, while the business conditions in the country are waiting. Now, through the efficiency and team work and harmony of the Democratic caucus and of the Democratic administration this bill comes before this House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be notified at the end of three minutes and to yield the two remaining minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] talks of efficiency of the party in power. Efficiency which depends on despotism and which takes all power from the majority of the membership of this House is not the kind of efficiency to be commended in a representative body. There is something just as important as efficiency, and that is liberty. I want to call attention to the quadruple gag in this resolution. Here are united four separate ways of gagging this House through the Committee on Rules. We may forget the caucus of last night and simply put our attention to the power of the Committee on Rules of the House. First, here is the discharge of a committee. The rules provide for the discharge of committees. Under the rules we have a system supposed to furnish a method for discharging a committee from consideration of a measure after a due time has elapsed. On the first day possible in this term, December 1, 1913, a resolution was introduced to discharge a committee under the rule. That motion and all others like it have never been considered in the Sixty-third Congress and never will be. During the entire two years of this Congress no motion to discharge a committee has been considered, yet the Rules Committee come in here and offers a rule to discharge the Committee on Naval Affairs from consideration of a bill, thus doing what a majority of this House has never been able to accomplish. Second, this rule limits debate to six hours on a proposition that the Senate has been considering for many weeks and which has never been considered by the House. Third, it forces an arbitrary rule on the House by which no amendment can be made to the measure. Fourth, it is the enactment of new legislation that has never been considered by a committee or by this House. The rule takes the four sections of the Weeks bill, but in the last provision provides that these four sections shall not go into effect until two years after the European war is over. These are the ways in which this rule proves that the majority of the membership is absolutely lacking in power and efficiency under customary methods of procedure. I want to support this measure, because I am in favor of the principle involved. I believe in the principle and policy of Government ownership of steamships, but these methods of dictating consideration are unjustifiable and can not be successfully defended any more than they have been by the chairman of the Committee on Rules, Mr. HENRY, and the others who have spoken here. These men are silent on the vital issues of legislative procedure in this rule, for such methods can not be defended.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I desire to yield two minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, I am for this bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But if I were against it, I would have a better reason for being against it than the fact that the President of the United States is for it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The opposition to the bill is largely partisan. I have seen the time in this body when if the Republican organization had proposed such a bill it would have had practically the unanimous Republican support. So much for the partisan side of this discussion. Now as to the proposed rule. As usual, whenever the House and the Senate have entangling parliamentary difficulties with a measure, the House is made the goat. Because there is no cloture rule whatever in the Senate, we must have complete cloture over here. Why should we be made to suffer for the sins of the Senate? Why should you Democrats gag us? Why should the majority here, when you have the President and are in complete control of both branches of the National Legislature—why should you apply the gag? Now, I am not shedding any crocodile tears over this procedure with the weeping Republicans. I have seen practically the same thing here before under Republican rule and in connection with shipping legislation. On January 14, 1907—if some of the Democratic chieftains care to do so they can hunt it up—a ship-subsidy bill, under the direction of the then Republican organization, was rammed through the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries in one day. It had been introduced by a new member of the committee, appointed to the committee for that purpose, apparently. There had been no previous regular meeting of that committee upon that bill. There had been for weeks previous, however, private dinner parties, at which the bill was considered, under direction of the Republican leaders. [Applause on the Democratic side.] So this is no new procedure. It is an old one. But why continue it? Now, Mr. Speaker, as to this measure, if I did not believe that there was included in it a plain proposition that we shall observe complete neutrality in the taking over of vessels [laughter on the Republican side]——

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Read it.

Mr. MURDOCK. Oh, I have read it over and over again.

A MEMBER. When?

Mr. MURDOCK. And, besides my satisfaction with the plain language of the provisions, I have in my mind what the Republicans could not have if they tried—full confidence in the President of the United States in reading those words as they are. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I wish the Democrats in this House would applaud more and gag less. I shall vote for the bill. The measure merits support, but it does not warrant the gag which accompanies its presentation here to-day.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Kansas to use some time.

Mr. CAMPBELL. How many speeches has the gentleman?

Mr. HENRY. Just one.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, this gag rule purposes to make in order the latest scheme of the President for reviving prostrate industry in the United States.

The President's appeals for the passage of his ship-purchase bill would be more convincing if any one of the other schemes he has proposed, one after another, had made good his promise that they would revive languishing industries throughout the country. What the country needs is more buying and selling at home, more confidence, more business among our own people; but nothing is proposed that will bring this condition.

And this bill is urged when it is doubtful if anyone believes it will become a law in this Congress. It is equally certain that few believe it should become a law at all, and a less number believe it would do any good if it does. It is safe to say that less than one-third of the American people or of the Members of this Congress believe in either the principle the bill involves or in the wisdom of its enactment into law. This gag rule purposes to force through the House, with whip and spur, the White House bill, with only a secret caucus indorsement. The bill in its present form has not even had the consideration of a committee at either end of the Capitol, and has had scant, if any, consideration at the Legislative Mansion, if I may borrow from the gentleman from Wyoming.

This bill launches the Government into the business of carrying private property for the private gain of a very few people. It put all of the people, by Government action, into competition with those of our people who are common carriers upon the sea. The President says the scheme will revive our languishing industries. The President has been just as sure that each of the five other schemes he has purposed, one after another, would do the same thing.

The purchase of foreign ships belonging to belligerents now interned in our ports, as proposed, would launch the Government upon a dangerous and most expensive experiment. Even if there were no danger that with the purchase of belligerent ships we should become involved in a foreign war, there is still no justification for the passage of this bill.

The Government must purchase ships, the President says, to afford facilities for exporting American products. There may have been a few days, after the beginning of the war in Europe, when our commerce, outward and inward, languished, but that condition has long since passed.

Since the beginning of the war our exports have increased far beyond our normal outward commerce. The official reports, up to the 1st of January, 1915, show we have exported since the war began over $9,000,000 worth of automobiles, $41,000,000 worth of steel products, $8,500,000 worth of woolen goods, $33,000,000 worth of leather products, and $17,000,000 worth of sugar. In the month of last December alone we exported 29,000,000 bushels of wheat, five times the amount exported in December of the year before, at the average price of $1.25 per bushel, while in December of the year 1913 the average price was 98 cents per bushel. In last December we exported $9,500,000 worth of flour, more than twice as much as in December, 1913. In December, 1914, we exported 5,250,000 bushels of oats, as against 30,000 bushels in December, 1913. The exports of oats in the month of December, 1914, was greater than for the entire year of 1913.

We exported in December, 1914, 4,500,000 bushels of corn, valued at $3,500,000, as against 749,000 bushels, valued at $560,000, in December, 1913. In December, 1914, we exported 6,500,000 pounds of fresh beef, as against 524,000 pounds in December, 1913. We exported as much fresh beef in December, 1914, as in the entire year of 1913. We have exported over $200,000,000 worth of breadstuffs since the war in Europe began. We have exported over $8,000,000 worth of horses. Last week cotton exports were 365,733 bales, a greater number of bales, it is claimed, than in any week last year; and the total exports of cotton for the year now totals almost 4,500,000 bales.

Mr. Speaker, all this vast outward commerce has brought better prices to the American producer, except cotton, than he has received for similar products under normal conditions of export in recent years.

But the President says that the cost of over-sea transportation is abnormal. The conditions of over-sea transportation are abnormal. Search and possible seizure, mines, war zones, congested foreign ports, difficulty in unloading in foreign ports, returning with light loads—all these abnormal conditions account for the abnormal increase in ocean freight rates and for whatever temporary difficulty cargoes find in leaving American ports.

From whom and from where does the demand come for this legislation? Certainly not from the farmers and manufacturers of the United States, for they are exporting in larger quantities than in the normal years of peace, and at better prices; and it follows that they have found sufficient facilities for carrying their larger exports, while the President and two members of his Cabinet have been taxing their own energies and the patience of the American people in an endeavor to secure the passage of this bill.

Why, the President within three days has received, if press reports are to be credited, from the mayor of New York an appeal to place an embargo on wheat, one of the chief products of the American farmer, and the reason for urging the embargo is that we have so enormously increased our wheat exports within the last few months that we have endangered the food supply of our own people.

The suggestion of an embargo on wheat has been made from many points in the eastern portion of the United States, while from the West there come demands to every Member of the Congress for an embargo on munitions of war, products of manufacture. Demands from every portion of our country come for an embargo on exports, and the answer of the administration is a proposition to embark the Government as a common carrier upon the seas of additional export products.

While the President has been taking his time and the time of the Congress in urging the purchase of five or six ships of commerce our increased exports have stimulated American shipbuilding, and private enterprise is now employed in building American ships for use in the common paths of the sea to the ports of the world with the export products of the American people. There is an unprecedented boom in shipbuilding in the shipyards of the United States. All along the Atlantic seaboard shipyards are busy. Newport News, the Maryland Steel Co., the New York Shipbuilding Co., the Fall River Shipbuilding Co. are all working to the limit of their capacity filling orders for ships. To-day there is under construction at Newport News two 15,000-ton steel vessels and two 10,000-ton steel freighters.

Is it the purpose of the Government to stop this one demand for American labor by the purchase of interned ships of belligerents now in American ports? There are 66 of these now in the ports of our country—55 German ships and 11 Austrian ships. Private citizens do not buy these, because of the diplomatic and international questions involved and the danger of involving our country in the deplorable war now waging in Europe. The administration should profit by the example of American citizens and refrain from an act that may involve this country in foreign complications that may at any time result in war.

In the meantime the promises of the Baltimore platform and of the President for rural-credit legislation and to reduce the cost of living are unkept. Nothing is done for conservation, and the appeals of Porto Rico for better government are unheeded. We approach the last days of this Congress, and only one of the great supply bills for the Government has become a law, and the President insists on consuming all the time on another experiment not promised by him or his platform.

Why does the President insist on this Congress, that has been so nearly repudiated, spending its last days passing on this important measure? Does he fear to submit his new proposal for Government competition with private enterprise in our overseas commerce to Representatives lately chosen by the people?

The President requires a platform pledge from his party as a basis of his support for woman suffrage and for limiting foreign immigration. He has neither a platform pledge nor a favorable expression from the people for this proposal. Indeed, he seems to fear to submit this measure to the latest Representatives chosen by the American people, and insists upon this consideration by a Congress that has been all but repudiated.

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to both the rule and the bill. I would avoid war by not provoking it. I would not purchase a quarrel by purchasing ships of belligerents in violation of the principles of international law to which we have subscribed. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] said that he had noticed where a baseball team started in by following every order of the captain they usually came out at the tail end when the season closed. Evidently the gentleman is a novice in the baseball business. I have seen a few baseball games myself, and my observation has been that where a team starts in by not following the orders of the captain at the beginning of the season they begin at the tail end and end there.

Mr. Speaker, we are following the lead of our captain, and you gentlemen will find that the American people follow his lead when he is this day undertaking to rescue them from the shipping pirates of the high seas. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Their attention is fixed on this body, and they know what is going on. The gentleman from Kansas, Mr. MURDOCK, made a very sensible speech. [Laughter on the Republican side.] The only regret I have is that he did not commence making sensible speeches at the beginning of his career. Now, Mr. Speaker, the other gentleman from Kansas, Mr. CAMPBELL—and I presume I will not be accused of saying anything offensive when I refer to him as a "standpat Republican"—speaks of this "gag rule" that we are passing to-day. Let me say to him that the people, the voters, everywhere will justify this "gag rule" rescuing them from the monopoly of the Shipping Trust and the oppression that has been going on for more than a hundred years. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And more than that, Mr. Speaker, when the contest comes in this country, when the session of Congress is ended, when we appeal to the American people under the leadership of Woodrow Wilson, and the people hear the voice of that other tribune of their rights, the Speaker of this House, the Hon. CHAMP CLARK [applause on the Democratic side], than whom no man here is better loved, and hear the voice of that other leader who goes to the other end of this Capitol, the Hon. OSCAR UNDERWOOD, in support of the Wilson administration, they will record a verdict justifying our action.

Gentlemen, we welcome this contest. It is a struggle between this administration and the Shipping Trust. He is grappling with the shipping monopoly before the gaze of the world. The Shipping Trust is going to destroy Wilson's administration or Wilson will destroy the Shipping Trust. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I believe when the contest is over the Shipping Trust will fall. It will not be the Democratic administration fighting in behalf of the American people. Ah, gentlemen talk about Government ownership and this Government embarking in commercial enterprises! Do you not recall that in the very beginning of this Government we embarked in Government ownership and constructed highways leading from one part of this continent to the other—among them the Cumberland Road—in order that the commerce of the people might be carried over them? Under Jefferson, Jackson, Madison, and Monroe we constructed these highways for the benefit of the people, so they might interchange their commerce. And then the war came on and this Government again embarked in Government ownership and aided in the construction of the great transcontinental railways, and the people applauded and justified that governmental enterprise. And when we came to the Panama Canal, under Roosevelt again we embarked in Government ownership, and are now making a success of that enterprise. And recently we passed the Alaskan railroad bill. And if you call that Government ownership, all well and good. It will justify itself, and if it takes Government ownership, if this Government must go into a commercial enterprise, to destroy the shipping monopoly and trust on the high seas, I am ready to follow the leader and cast my vote in favor of it. What do you gentlemen propose? You propose a subsidy, to be taken out of the pockets of the taxpayers and put in the pockets of this monopoly, and at the end of that time the people will have no relief.

We propose something that is sound, that is sane, that will justify itself, and that will bring the relief we have promised the American people; and let me say that when this fight has been finished, after Woodrow Wilson has presented his record to the voters and you have taken the other side of the issue, in 1916 he will triumph, because he is fighting for the people's cause, and you are on the side of the special privileged class.

We welcome the conflict. Call on the battle. Shall the shipping pirates of the high seas win or the Democratic administration of Woodrow Wilson go down in loss of confidence and support? For my part, I will be standing by Wilson's side in this last death struggle against the world's greatest and most conscienceless monopoly. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll. Those who favor the resolution will, when their names are called, answer "yea"; those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 186, nays 139, answered "present" 2, not voting 96, as follows:

So the resolution was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

On the vote:

Mr. UNDERHILL (for) with Mr. HAYES (against).

Mr. HAMILL (for) with Mr. TREADWAY (against).

Mr. STANLEY (for) with Mr. AVIS (against).

Mr. EDWARDS (for) with Mr. DUNN (against).

Mr. CANTRILL (for) with Mr. GRIEST (against).

Mr. SCULLY (for) with Mr. WALLIN (against).

Until further notice:

Mr. SPARKMAN with Mr. PROUTY.

Mr. ESTOPINAL with Mr. MCGUIRE of Oklahoma.

Mr. HART with Mr. MANAHAN.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that those who have spoken on the rule and those who may speak on the bill may have five legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] asks unanimous consent that those who have spoken on the rule and those who speak on the bill may have five legislative days in which to extend their remarks. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The Chair wishes to correct a ruling. When the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] made a parliamentary inquiry this morning the Chair read only the first sentence of this rule:

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution the Committee on Naval Affairs shall be discharged from further consideration of S. 5259 and the House shall proceed immediately to the consideration of same.

The Chair is still of the opinion that if that was all there was to it the House would go into Committee of the Whole; but the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] has called the attention of the Chair to the last paragraph in the rule, which reads as follows:

At the conclusion of the general debate the previous question shall be considered as ordered upon the amendments and the bill, and vote shall be had upon the final passage of the bill without other intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Inasmuch as the previous question can not be ordered in Committee of the Whole, that settles the intention of the gentleman who drew this resolution; and the Chair will request the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] to preside in the House as Speaker pro tempore. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. UNDERWOOD). The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] is recognized.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT].

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, under the rule I desire to offer the following amendments to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendments. Does the gentleman desire the entire paper read?

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider the amendments as read and pending. They are the identical amendments provided for in the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendments.

Mr. MADDEN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MADDEN. I understand that the bill as presented in the House does not contain some of the amendments offered by the caucus. Where are they?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that the printed copies of the bill, as agreed to in the resolution which has been adopted, will be on the Doorkeeper's desk shortly.

Mr. MADDEN. Are we going to proceed to the consideration of a bill without the bill before us?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The printed bill will be here in a few minutes.

Mr. PADGETT. The Senate bill is printed.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the reading of the amendments offered by the gentleman from Tennessee be taken out of the time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] for general debate?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will not. This is the presenting of the amendments to the House, and the reading does not come out of the time on either side.

The Clerk read as follows:

By Mr. PADGETT:

Page 1, line 3, after the word "that," insert "with the approval of the President"; in line 5, page 2, strike out the word "shall" and substitute the word "to"; at the end of the bill add new sections, as follows:

"SEC. 5. That the United States, acting through the shipping board hereinafter created, may subscribe to the capital stock of a corporation of the District of Columbia. Said corporation shall have for its object the purchase, construction, equipment, maintenance, and operation of merchant vessels to meet the requirements of the foreign commerce of the United States, or to charter vessels for such purposes, and to make charters or leases of any vessel or vessels owned by such corporation to any other corporation, organized under the laws of a State, a majority of the stock being owned by citizens of the United States, firm or individual citizen or citizens of the United States, to be used for such purposes, and shall have power to carry out said objects and purposes: Provided, That the terms and conditions of such charter parties shall first be approved by the shipping board, the initial capital stock of which corporation shall not be over $10,000,000, of the par value of $100 per share: And provided further, That said corporation shall make no charter or lease of any vessel to any corporation, firm, or individual for a longer period than 12 months, and said corporation shall specify in the charter or lease the rates, charges, and fares to be observed by such corporation, firm, or individual chartering or leasing any such vessel or vessels as a maximum to be charged during the life of such charter or lease, and there shall be contained in said charter or lease a provision terminating the same whenever the charterer or the lessee shall violate any of its provisions. It is hereby made the duty of such corporation to take such steps as may be necessary to terminate any such charter or lease whenever the corporation, firm, or individual, party to such charter or lease, shall violate the provisions of the same.

"The members of said shipping board, as incorporators, may for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act, form a corporation of the District of Columbia, by making and filing a certificate of incorporation, as provided in subchapter 4 of chapter 18 of an act entitled 'An act to establish a code of laws for the District of Columbia,' approved March 3, 1901.

"The corporation so formed, its officers and trustees and stockholders, shall possess all the powers conferred and perform all the duties imposed by said subchapter 4, except as the same are by this act limited or qualified.

"The powers of said corporation shall be limited to the purposes of this act and to such as are necessarily incident thereto.

"Said corporation may sue and be sued in any district court of the United States, and may remove to said courts any cause brought against it in any other court.

"Said corporation may require any officer or employee to give security for the faithful performance of his duties.

"Persons subscribing to the stock of said company shall pay for the same in full at the time of subscription.

"The stock owned by the United States shall be voted by the shipping board or its duly selected representative.

"The officers and trustees of said corporation shall be citizens of the United States, but need not be citizens of the District of Columbia. Such officers and trustees shall be subject to removal at any time by vote of a majority of the stock at any meeting thereof.

"Said corporation and its capital stock shall, so long as the United States owns a majority of said stock, be free from all public taxes.

"At no time shall less than 51 per cent of the stock of said corporation be held by the United States, unless the United States shall dispose of all of its stock.

"Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

"SEC. 6. That the United States shall subscribe to 51 per cent of the initial capital stock of such corporation at par and the remainder thereof may be offered for public subscription at not less than par, and the United States may then further subscribe at par for any amount of such stock not taken by public subscription, but the shipping board may cause such corporation to begin business as soon as 51 per cent of such stock has been subscribed and paid for by the United States. The shipping board, with the approval of the President, may consent to or may cause an increase of the capital stock from time to time as the interests of the corporation may require, but without authority of Congress the portion of such increase to be paid for by the United States shall not exceed $10,000,000, neither shall the proportion of stock held by the United States at any time be less than 51 per cent: Provided, That a sufficient number of the shares of stock of said corporation shall be set apart for holding by the persons for whom the stock of the United States may be voted as trustees, and such shares shall be issued or transferred to such persons to qualify them as trustees of such corporation, and such shares shall be transferred to the successor or successors of any such person or persons.

"SEC. 7 That the United States, through the shipping board and with the approval of the President, is authorized to purchase or construct vessels suitable in the judgment of the shipping board for the purposes of such corporation with a view to transferring them to such corporation, and for this purpose the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the request of the shipping board and the approval of the President, may issue and sell or use for such purchases or construction any of the bonds of the United States now available in the Treasury of the United States under the act of August 5, 1909, the act of February 4, 1910, and the act of March 2, 1911, relating to the issue of bonds for the construction of the Panama Canal, to a total amount not to exceed $30,000,000, for the purpose of purchasing or constructing such vessels: Provided, That any Panama Canal bonds issued and sold or used under the provisions of this section or other existing authority may be made payable at such time after issue as the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, may deem advisable and fix, instead of 50 years after date of issue, as in said act of August 5, 1909, not exceeding 50 years: Provided further, That payments for such purchases or construction from the proceeds of sales of bonds, or delivery of bonds in payment thereof, shall be made only as ordered and directed by the shipping board: And provided further, That in making purchases of ships during the continuance of the present European war no purchases shall be made in a way which will disturb the conditions of neutrality.

"SEC. 8. That the shipping board is authorized to transfer the vessels purchased or constructed as herein provided to any such corporation in which the United States has become a stockholder as hereinbefore provided, and such corporation shall issue to the United States in payment thereof its gold bonds, bearing interest at not less than 4 per cent per annum, and upon such further terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the shipping board, such bonds to be secured by a first-mortgage lien upon such vessels, severally, thus transferred: Provided, That the amount of bonds received by the United States in payment for such vessels shall not be less, at the then par value, than the total amount expended by the United States in the purchase or construction of such vessels, and the same may be sold by the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, and with the approval of the President, to reimburse the Treasury for expenditures made in the purchase or construction of vessels: And provided further, That said corporation shall not issue any bonds in excess of $40,000,000 or incur any liabilities other than stock issues in excess of $10,000,000. Such corporation shall make suitable provision for sinking fund and for the depreciation charges under the rules and regulations to be prescribed by such shipping board, and all vessels acquired under this act, or in which the United States shall otherwise be interested as owner, in whole or in part, or upon which the United States shall have or hold any mortgage, pledge, lien, or other security, shall, when and while employed solely as merchant vessels, be in all respects subject to all laws, regulations, and liabilities governing merchant vessels in like manner and to the same extent as merchant vessels in private ownership when duly registered under the laws of the United States.

"All rules and regulations relating to or which affect shipping, navigation, or water-borne commerce of the United States, heretofore made or published by authority of law, shall only be and remain in force until midnight on the 31st day of December, 1915, and by proclamation of the President shall cease to have any force or validity at any prior date when new shipping rules and regulations shall as provided hereby take the place of those now in existence.

"The shipping board herein provided for shall propose such rules and regulations applicable to the shipping and water-borne commerce of the United States in lieu of those now in force and covering matters of like character as they may determine suited to the present needs of such shipping and commerce, which, when approved by the President and published, shall apply and become of full force and effect in lieu of such rules and regulations as are now applicable thereto. In the rules and regulations hereby authorized to be adopted and put into force different classes of shipping, navigation, and water-borne commerce may be appropriately and differently treated and provided for. Such rules and regulations when promulgated may be modified, changed, or amended by the shipping board.

"SEC. 9. That vessels purchased or constructed by such shipping board and conveyed to such corporation as herein provided shall be entitled to registry under the laws of the United States and shall be deemed vessels of the United States and entitled to the benefits and privileges appertaining to such vessels, except such vessels shall engage only in trade with foreign countries or with Alaska, the Philippine Islands, the Hawaiian Islands, and the islands of Porto Rico, Guam, and Tutuila: Provided, That the above restrictions shall not apply to such of said vessels as are built in the United States. Such vessels shall be subject to the navigation laws of the United States except as herein provided.

"SEC. 10. That the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Commerce and three additional members, two of whom shall be of practical experience in the management and operation of steamships in the foreign trade, are hereby constituted a board to be known as the shipping board, with full power, subject to the approval of the President, to vote the stock of the United States in said corporation, either as a body or by one or more of its members duly authorized by a majority, and to do all things necessary, whether specifically enumerated or not, to carry out the purposes of this act and protect the interests of the United States, said three additional members to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The salary of each of the three additional members of said board so appointed shall be $6,000 per annum.

"SEC. 11. That, with the approval of the Congress, such shipping board may at any time sell the stock of such corporation owned by the United States.

"SEC. 12. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to charter, lease, or transfer such naval auxiliaries belonging to the Naval Establishment of the United States as are suitable for commercial use and which are not required for use in the Navy in time of peace, and vessels belonging to the War Department suitable for commercial uses and not required for military transports in time of peace, and to direct or cause to be chartered, leased, or transferred vessels now owned and operated by the Panama Railroad Co., to any corporation now or hereafter organized as in this act provided upon such terms and conditions as the shipping board, with the approval of the President of the United States, shall prescribe. The vessels purchased or constructed by the United States through the shipping board, with the approval of the President of the United States, shall be of a type, as far as the commercial requirements of the foreign trade of the United States may permit, suitable for use as naval auxiliaries in the Naval Establishment of the United States.

"SEC. 13. That the President of the United States, upon giving to any such corporation in which the United States shall be a stockholder, through its president, vice president, secretary, or manager, notice in writing for such reasonable length of time as in his judgment the circumstances require and will permit of his intention so to do, may take possession, absolutely or temporarily, for use as naval auxiliaries of any vessel or vessels owned or leased by or otherwise in the possession of said corporation, and said corporation shall be entitled to a reasonable price or rental therefor, to be fixed by the shipping board, with the approval of the President: Provided, That if in the judgment of the President an emergency exists requiring such action he may take possession of any such vessel or vessels without notice.

"SEC. 14. That the shipping board shall make to Congress, at the beginning of each regular session, a report of expenditures and receipts under this act and of the operations of any corporation in which the United States may have become a stockholder hereunder.

"SEC. 15. That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000,000, or, in lieu of such appropriation, the Secretary of the Treasury may sell Panama Canal bonds to the amount of $10,000,000 in addition to those provided for in section 7, and on the same terms, and set apart and use the proceeds thereof for such purposes.

"SEC. 16. That two years from and after the conclusion of the present European war, that fact to be determined by the President, the corporation and the shipping board shall turn over and transfer all vessels purchased or constructed under the provisions of this act to the Navy Department, and the Secretary of the Navy shall have the right, with the approval of the President, to lease or charter any of such vessels not needed for naval or military purposes to any firm, individual, or corporation for use as merchant vessels.

"That the Secretary of the Navy shall in such leases provide for their cancellation whenever such vessels may be required for naval or military purposes.

"That all leases made under this section of the act shall be subject to all of the provisions of section 5 of this act relating to maximum rates and charges and terms and conditions of forfeiture.

"That when the vessels, lands, piers, leases for land or piers, and other property held by the corporation are disposed of as herein provided the corporation herein provided for shall be dissolved and said shipping board abolished.

"SEC. 17. That sections 1, 2, 3, and 4 of this act shall not take effect until two years from and after the conclusion of the present European war, that fact to be determined by the President."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman withhold that just a moment, until the Chair ascertains the situation? Has the pending bill been read?

Mr. PADGETT. It has not. The bill (S. 5259) ought to be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman from Illinois withhold his point of order and allow the Chair to have the bill read?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the original Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to establish one or more United States Navy mail lines, by employing such vessels of the Navy as in his discretion are available, without impairment to the paramount duties of the Navy, and as are necessary and appropriate, for the purpose of establishing and maintaining regular communication between the east or west coast, or both coasts, of the United States and either or both coasts of South America and between the United States and the countries of Europe. The vessels so employed shall carry United States mail, passengers, and freight under such regulations and at such rate or rates as the Secretary of the Navy may prescribe. Such civilians, such officers of the naval auxiliary service, and such officers and enlisted men of the Navy, including officers on the retired list, as the Secretary of the Navy may deem necessary, shall be employed in the business of the said mail line or lines, and retired officers of the Navy so employed at sea or on shore shall, in all respects, be held and considered to be in an active duty status, and shall receive the pay and allowances of officers of the active list of the same rank and length of service: Provided, That officers placed on the retired list on account of wounds or disability incident to the service, or on account of age, or after 30 years' service, shall not be ordered to such duty without their consent.

The enlisted strength of the Navy, as now or hereafter authorized by law, is hereby increased by the number of men required to man the vessels so employed, and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to enlist such number of men in the Navy for such terms of enlistment, not to exceed four years, as may be desirable, and to distribute the number of men so enlisted among the various ratings of the Navy.

SEC. 2. That in addition to and as a part of the line of the Navy there is hereby established an active reserve list. Line officers placed on the active reserve list under the provisions of this act shall be held to be in an active-duty status in all respects, except that officers on the active reserve list shall not be advanced on the active reserve list except for eminent and conspicuous conduct in battle, or extraordinary heroism, when their advancement thereon for these causes shall be governed by the provisions of law governing the advancement of officers on the active list for like causes. All laws now in effect with reference to the retirement of officers from the active list are hereby extended to include officers on the active reserve list.

SEC. 3. That sections 8 and 9 of the act approved March 3, 1899, entitled "An act to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy and Marine Corps of the United States," as amended by the act approved August 22, 1912, entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913, and for other purposes," are so far amended that officers who hereafter volunteer or are selected for retirement as therein provided shall be held and considered to have volunteered for transfer to the active reserve list, or shall be selected for transfer to the active reserve list, respectively; and the transfer of such officers to the active reserve list in lieu of their retirement shall be made subject to the restrictions imposed by the provisions of the said sections as amended.

SEC. 4. That in addition to such part of existing appropriations as may be available for the expenses of operating the line or lines herein provided for, the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy for the purpose of organizing, inaugurating, and carrying on the traffic provided for in this act and in defraying the operating expenses incident thereto: Provided, That all money received for the transportation of mail, passengers, and freight, as provided in section 1 of this act, and for such other services as may be incident to the operation of the said line or lines, is hereby made available, in addition to the aforesaid sum of $100,000 herein appropriated, for expenses incident to the proper conduct of the business contemplated in this act: Provided further, That any sum of money herein appropriated which remains unexpended at the end of the third fiscal year after the passage of this act, and at the end of each fiscal year thereafter, shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and twenty-two Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On this roll call 292 Members have answered to their names, a quorum. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB].

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, in order that we may thoroughly understand the situation with reference to the two bills in one I will take a little time to explain it as I understand it. The Gore bill, which we are about to vote upon at the end of six hours' debate, is practically the same as the Alexander bill reported by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries last September and introduced in the Senate by Senator STONE. The bill before you now is a composite bill composed of the Weeks bill, so called, and the Gore bill, so called. The Weeks bill last August passed the Senate practically unanimously; in fact, I think it did pass unanimously. The Gore bill is now pending in the Senate.

We have had assurances from the other end of the Capitol frequently that if the Gore bill could be made a temporary measure much support would be gained for it, and, in fact, some have been led to believe that the Gore bill, under those circumstances, could pass.

Now, what is done in the bill under consideration to-day is to make the Gore bill a temporary measure and abolish the shipping corporation two years after hostilities in Europe are concluded, and at the end of that time put in effect the Weeks bill, which passed the Senate unanimously. In other words, we have given gentlemen at the other end of the Capitol what they say they want in the Gore bill and what they voted for in the Weeks bill.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I will.

Mr. MANN. How are the minority stockholders to be protected when the vessels are turned over under this bill?

Mr. WEBB. That is a matter of detail, but I will answer it. You will have no minority stockholders. I do not think any private party will invest in the stock of the corporation.

Mr. MANN. That is the gentleman's answer—that there will be no minority stockholders?

Mr. WEBB. I think not; it will be a corporation like the Panama Railroad or the Panama Steamship Co., and if there should be any minority stockholders the stock will be paid for when it is turned over to the Navy Department.

Mr. TOWNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. For a brief question.

Mr. TOWNER. If that be the case, and I agree with the gentleman, if this property is to be turned over without compensation, there are no minority stockholders who would subscribe. If this is the case, where would there be any reason for the organization of a corporation at all?

Mr. WEBB. None whatever, except that it is a mere fiction. We did it in the case of the Panama Railroad Co. and in the case of the Panama Steamship Co. It is a mere fiction, which the American people love to follow because of the habit. There is not much real difference between authorizing the outright purchase by the Government of these vessels and the owning and operating of them by a corporation, all of whose stock is owned by the United States.

The Weeks bill, which, as I say, passed the Senate practically unanimously, provides that the Secretary of the Navy may take such vessels as are not absolutely necessary in the Navy Department and use them in the establishment of mail steamship lines, which lines shall also carry not only mail but passengers and freight also.

Now, you would have thought that our friends in the Senate who inveigh against socialism in the Gore bill would have raised a mighty howl against that proposition in the Weeks bill, and yet the principle in the Gore bill is the same as is involved in the Weeks bill, with one exception, and that is that the vessels operating under the Weeks bill shall be operated by naval officers, while those operated under the Gore bill are operated by civilians. I confess that, in view of troubled conditions across the sea, I think it is better at present to have Government vessels operated by civilians rather than have them operated by naval officers in United States uniforms.

Therefore we have provided that the Weeks bill shall be suspended until two years after hostilities cease, and in the meantime the Gore bill shall take effect, so when the Gore bill dies the vessels which the shipping corporation own may be operated under the Weeks bill or may be leased or chartered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does the Gore bill provide that these ships shall go into Alaskan ports and operate to and from Alaska?

Mr. WEBB. Yes, sir. That was an amendment adopted in caucus last night—providing that Alaskan ports should be included in the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It is to be treated as a foreign port and not as a coastwise port?

Mr. WEBB. It is to be treated like Hawaii. Hawaii is a Territory, and so is Alaska, and we thought it would be unfair to make a discrimination between different ports, both being coastwise countries.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does not the gentleman think that is a very important matter to be considered?

Mr. WEBB. This is an emergency measure, and it is proposed that the vessels shall go where they are most needed, as I shall show the gentleman later on.

Now, we all, Republicans and Democrats alike, for 25 years have agitated the question of a larger merchant marine.

In 1821 American-owned vessels carried 89 per cent of the commerce of the United States, but from that time to the present hour our American vessels have been carrying less and less of our commerce, until they have almost vanished from the seas. To-day they carry 7¾ per cent of our foreign commerce. That commerce amounts to two billions and a half dollars of exports and $2,000,000,000 of imports, and yet we carry in American bottoms only a little pitiful 7¾ per cent of that tremendous commerce. Sir Walter Raleigh, after whom my own State capital was named, at one time said that the Nation that controls the seas controls the commerce of the world, and the nation that controls the commerce of the world controls the wealth of the world, and the nation that controls the wealth of the world controls the world.

England learned this many, many years ago, and although she is little larger than my native State in area, still she has 20,000,000 tons engaged in deep-sea commerce, while our country with a hundred million people has a little pitiful 1,000,000 tons. Everyone agrees that we ought to have a merchant marine, that our expanding commerce demands it, and yet American statesmanship up to this good hour has failed to devise a plan by which that great merchant marine may be built up. Our Republican friends, many of them, have supported the idea that we should go into the Public Treasury and take out the people's money and put it into the private pockets of corporations to build up the merchant marine; but that has not been satisfactory. That has not succeeded. In fact, we subsidize vessels now to the extent of a million dollars a year. That has done no good. England's entire subsidy is only $3,000,000 a year, and England has twenty times as many tons on the seas as the United States, which has $1,000,000 of subsidies a year. I say again that something ought to be done, and, if possible, quickly. How shall it be done? The Republican Party has been in power for half a century, and during all that time our great merchant marine has been gradually fading from the seas. It has been a great problem. Of course, land business has been more profitable than sea business. Our Republican friends have tried to revive the merchant marine with subsidies, but with a great Republican majority they have not been able to pass a bill subsidizing merchant ships, for there are always enough Republicans opposed to it who, together with the Democrats, kill it, and the Democratic Party has never stood for that, and we therefore agree that subsidies can not be granted.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Has not the Democratic Party always uniformly opposed every Republican effort to build up a merchant marine by subsidies?

Mr. WEBB. All the Democrats and some Republicans have opposed private subsidies, and we expect to do that as long as we are a party. We believe that it is better to take all of the people's money and spend it for all of the people rather than to take all of the people's money and put it into the private pockets of a few great corporations for their private benefit. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is the fundamental difference between the Democratic Party and those Republicans who feel like my friend from Pennsylvania does.

Mr. MOORE. What is the difference between taking $30,000,000 direct from the pockets of the people and buying ships and having the Government enter into an enterprise that involves risks?

Mr. WEBB. If my friend can not see the difference between them, I do not want to spend the time telling him. I ask him to come over and vote for this bill if he sees no difference, because this bill takes $30,000,000 direct for the use and benefit of all the people, and not for a few private shipowners. My friend knows the difference, and everyone in the House knows it.

I am willing to answer any question if the question is direct, because I think sometimes we can bring out matters more clearly by questions than we can in general debate if the question is asked in good faith. But I do not want to explain any more the difference between the proposition in this bill and a private subsidy.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What effect does the gentleman think the passage of this bill will have on shipbuilding now going on in shipyards of the United States for private shipowners?

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I confess to my friend that I can not answer that and nobody else can. I see that all the shipyards are being opened now and are "booming." I suppose if we construct some more ships under this act in the American shipyards it will help the "boom," and if we can not build them in that way we can buy them.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Has the gentleman from North Carolina observed in the press that some proposed builders who had contemplated giving orders for four ships have cancelled these orders, pending the legislation now under contemplation?

Mr. WEBB. Oh, that is like some of the great factories I have heard of, that close down just before an election and tell the workmen that if they do not vote the Republican ticket they will stay closed down forever. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] That is a bluff, pure and simple, and will fool nobody.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, will not the gentleman from North Carolina ask the gentleman from Kansas to give the names of those people to whom he refers and to be more explicit?

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Kansas to do that a little later. Let us see now if there is any necessity for such a bill.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman to say that he was willing to explain certain features of the bill as he went along?

Mr. WEBB. I would not want to go into the details of the bill. I will leave that to Judge ALEXANDER. I can not do it in 20 minutes, but any general question I am quite willing to answer.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. That is what I want to ask. First, I want to know if the Democratic caucus last evening made any change in the so-called Weeks bill on page 1, lines 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11?

Mr. WEBB. I have not the bill before me, and I can not answer the question. What is provided in those lines?

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. If the gentleman is familiar with the so-called Weeks bill——

Mr. WEBB. I am.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. It provides that the Secretary of the Navy might operate naval vessels on certain lines of trade.

Mr. WEBB. I can answer the question. The only amendment made to the Weeks bill was, after the words "Secretary of the Navy" insert the words "with the approval of the President."

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. That is the only change made in the Weeks bill?

Mr. WEBB. That is the only amendment to the Weeks bill, except to postpone its effect until two years after hostilities cease.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. WEBB. I hope the gentleman will not insist; I would be glad to yield if I had the time.

Mr. ROBERTS of Massachusetts. I wanted information only; I have no idea of delaying the gentleman.

Mr. WEBB. I have only about 10 minutes remaining and I have just begun. I hope the gentleman will understand that I do not intend to be discourteous. I always answer questions, because I think that is a good way to debate matters.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEBB. If the gentleman will allow me to proceed with my statement, I will yield later, if I have the time. Now, gentlemen, we all agree we ought to have a merchant marine. We all agree, so far, no plan has been presented that will produce that great merchant marine. I doubt if there are 50 men in the Hall who will agree on one particular method by which an American merchant marine may be built up. You may say, Repeal the shipping laws; but you can not do it. The Republicans, I think, would not vote to ever repeal all the shipping laws, and neither will many Democrats, so that can not now be done. The question is, Shall we do something now in the nature of Government control and ownership to save the situation or do nothing? We produce 25 per cent of all the wheat in the world. We produce 45 per cent of all the pig iron in the world. We produce 40 per cent of all the coal in the world. We produce 60 per cent of all the corn and 65 per cent of the world's cotton. We export 30,000,000 barrels of petroleum oil every year. We have not the vessels in which to transport even a decent fraction of our products. Eight per cent is all we carry in American bottoms, and our exports must be carried in our foreign competitors' bottoms, and will be carried in our competitors' bottoms unless this Congress does something in the present emergency to relieve the situation not only temporarily, but I would like to see it be relieved permanently and forever, and you gentlemen who oppose this proposition ought not to criticize the sponsors of this bill, unless you can present something better in its stead.

Mr. MADDEN. We do not get a chance to present anything, not even an amendment.

Mr. WEBB. Yes; you do. At the end of this debate you have an opportunity to offer your own bill to be voted on.

Mr. MADDEN. You will not even let us offer an amendment.

Mr. WEBB. We provide how it can be done on a motion to recommit, and then you gentlemen will have a chance to show how you would build up a merchant marine.

Mr. GLASS. They had the opportunity for 40 years and did not do it.

Mr. WEBB. They have had the opportunity for half a century to build it up, and during all that period the merchant marine has been growing sadly less. Now, Mr. Speaker, is there any necessity for an emergency merchant marine as provided in this bill? Is there any man who denies that the exports of the United States are being hampered by the checked and clogged conditions in every port in the United States? Only on the 6th day of this month the collectors of practically every port in the United States telegraphed to the Secretary of the Treasury the conditions with regard to commerce in each particular port, and without an exception the collectors wired that all the ports were jammed, clogged, and crowded with wheat, cotton, corn, lumber, tobacco, and many other products ready for export, with no ships to take them. Can we as American Representatives afford to go to the country and say we have no way by which we can relieve that situation, but must let our commerce be clogged, choked, and left to rot and die because you do not want to embark the Government on an idea of ownership and control of vessels in order to relieve that situation and keep the commerce and business of this country from dying?

Mr. STEENERSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEBB. I would prefer not just now. My time is limited. I do not desire to be discourteous to the gentleman, and if possible I will yield later.

Mr. STEENERSON. Only for a question.

Mr. WEBB. When I get through I will be glad to do so. In some of the ports the collectors wire that the railroads had placed embargoes on any further delivery of cargoes into those ports. What are we going to do, gentlemen? What are we going to do? Are we going back to our people and tell them that we can do nothing? Are we going back to them and tell them we tried to do nothing?

If you gentlemen on that side have any better scheme than this one, pray present it. You ought to have presented one long ago. We have tried to get together on some bill to relieve this terrible situation, but in some parts of this Capitol they seem to be fiddling while Rome is burning. It is an emergency situation. The life, health, and blood of our entire commerce depends upon something being done for it and on its being done quickly. It will not do to wait, even six months or two years. The patient may die, stagnation may set in, and worse business conditions may spring up than even those already created by this terrible war in Europe. That is not the worst of it. We not only have not the vessels—because practicaly all the German merchant vessels have gone out of business and numbers of other vessels have been taken over by the warring nations as naval auxiliaries—consequently we have a great scarcity of merchant vessels at a time when we need them most. We now have an opportunity that few nations in their history ever had, in reference to foreign commerce, and the thing that is needed to make it blossom like the rose and return prosperity in great waves is sufficient ships, with reasonable freight rates, to carry our commerce abroad to the people who want it.

Not only, my friends, is there a scarcity of vessels, but the men who own and control the great Shipping Trust, both foreign and domestic, know they have the American people by the throat, and instead of charging normal or twice normal prices they have run rates, in some instances, up a thousand per cent, and just last December they took out of the shippers, out of the pockets of the American people, $18,000,000 more than normal freight rates. In 12 short months if we can save to the people of the United States an average of $18,000,000 per month, we would have saved them $206,000,000, and with this result attained at the end of that time you could afford to burn all the vessels that we could buy under this bill.

Mr. KELLEY of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. WEBB. I would rather not. Cotton, the great staple that has always kept the balance of trade in the United States—its exportation has been hampered because, instead of charging the normal price of $1.25 a bale, these high-sea pirates are charging $17 a bale to carry it across the ocean, and other freight rates are being raised in proportion. I ask you what you are going to do? Are you going to let foreign and domestic trusts rob us and not try to break loose from that strangle hold?

This may not be a perfect measure, but it is a patriotic measure, and men ought to join in in order to relieve this situation as best we may. You say it is Government ownership. That has no terrors to me. Long ago this country went into Government ownership—from the days of Thomas Jefferson and Abraham Lincoln down to the time of William H. Taft and Woodrow Wilson. We have been in the Government control and ownership of interstate highways and business for a hundred years, and if there was ever a time when we should engage in it that time is now. Thomas Jefferson ordered a great highway surveyed from Baltimore to New Orleans. Has the Government a right to build highways? Yes. A little later on the Cumberland Road was ordered to be built, a great interstate-commerce road from Cumberland, Md., to Jefferson City, Mo., and they spent $710,000 to build it. And in Abraham Lincoln's administration great transcontinental railroads needed to be built, and the Government got behind them and built them, and in many cases practically controlled them. And not only that, they built the same kind of road from Chicago and Cairo to New Orleans. In 1904 the Government of the United States authorized the building of the Philippine railroads and guaranteed 4 per cent interest on their bonds. That is on the statute books now, and a Republican Congress passed it, and they let the building materials go into the Philippine Islands duty free, even though they were such strong protectionists in those days. And then there was the parcel post. For years and years we heard the cry that "you are going to put the Government in the carrying business in competition with private enterprise, the express companies. Do not dare to put the Government in the business of carrying small packages." But the Government went into it, and is in it, and where is the man who now would vote to repeal it—the parcel-post law?

The Government is carrying freight on land. Why not carry it on the sea? We authorized the Alaskan Railroad. We make powder and armor plate and many other things that private individuals not only make, but want to make. Here in our foreign commerce is the situation that private individuals can not meet even if they wanted to. But human hands fail and are unable and the Government steps in; there is no paternalism in the proposition. We print envelopes and sell them to the people of the United States. We are in the stationery business, and private individuals want to do the work. We destroy the cattle tick and the boll weevil and do thousands of other things. And not only that, I suppose that many of you on that side of the House voted to put the Government into the insurance business.

Mr. MANN. We voted against it very decidedly, and it has proven a failure.

Mr. WEBB. The gentleman will have to wait and give us more time before he can say that——

Mr. ALEXANDER. It is not a failure. The Government is writing war-risk insurance at one-eighth of 1 per cent.

Mr. WEBB. The war-risk insurance bill passed the Senate, and the Republican Senators who are now holding their hands up in holy horror against this shipping bill voted to allow the Government to insure the cargoes that are carried abroad in monopolistic ships. I can not see the difference in owning the ships that carry the cargoes and the Government insuring the cargoes which the ships carry. I have no metaphysical scissors with which I can make a distinction in principle.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not think we voted for that on this side of the House?

Mr. WEBB. I think a number of you did.

Mr. MANN. A very small number.

Mr. WEBB. Well, I am sure that quite a number of Republicans in the Senate did, and also a goodly number of Republicans in the House.

There are others who say this bill is unconstitutional, because there is no warrant in the Constitution that gives the Government the right to do this. That is worn-out doctrine. That has been declared otherwise by the Supreme Court for many, many years, and I refer gentlemen who care to read on this point to the case of Wilson versus Shaw, reported in the Two hundred and fourth United States Reports, where a man by the name of Wilson undertook to restrain the building of the Panama Canal, and the Supreme Court, Justice Gray speaking for that court, said it has too long been settled under the commerce clause of the Constitution of the United States that Congress not only has the power to construct railroads but create corporations for the purpose of building railroads and constructing canals and operating them. There is your highest authority in this country construing the Constitution with reference to the building of railroads and canals. If we have the power under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution to build railroads, maintain them, and operate them, why have we not the right under the same clause of the Constitution, which is granted in the same identical language, to maintain and build a line of ships to foreign countries?

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WEBB. Just for a question.

Mr. MILLER. Does not the gentleman make a distinction between the authority to regulate commerce and authority to engage in commerce?

Mr. WEBB. That point has been made many times, but the Supreme Court says the point is not well taken.

Mr. MILLER. And that is the distinction the Supreme Court has made every time it has been before it.

Mr. WEBB. The Supreme Court says the contention is not sound. If it were the court would have restrained the building and operation of the Panama Canal. They say we have the right to build the Panama Canal under the interstate-commerce laws of the Constitution. Under that commerce clause we can establish, regulate, and operate a ship line or lines to foreign countries.

Now, if we can establish railroads and build canals, we can also establish a ship line on the sea, because we have the same power on the sea with reference to foreign commerce as we have on the land with reference to interstate commerce. I shall not take the time of the House to read what Mr. Justice Gray said, but if any of you are in doubt about it, I ask you to read it. I will, without reading it, put it in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. You will not put it in the RECORD unless you read it. I am going to object to all extensions.

Mr. WEBB. I hope the gentleman will not filibuster.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] use some of his time?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I have served as a member of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries ever since I have been a Member of this House. Since the Democratic Party came into power in 1911 I have never filed a minority report against a bill brought out by the majority of the committee, of which my friend from Missouri, Judge ALEXANDER, is chairman, until I prepared a minority report upon this bill.

The hearings on the bill (H. R. 18666) which was reported to this House were only of one day's duration, and the only person who appeared before us as representing the Government was the Hon. William G. McAdoo, Secretary of the United States Treasury. The members of the committee tried to ascertain from him what was intended by the bill; whether it was intended to go into the overseas foreign trade or whether it was intended to go into the South American trade. We obtained but very little information from him, and most of the information furnished was that it was intended to go into the South American trade, but that it was, as we well knew, in the power of Congress to do whatsoever it pleased. And when some of the members of the committee raised the question as to the advisability of the bill providing for Government ownership, his answer was: "Leave the matter to the President. You all have confidence in the President. Leave the whole subject to him."

I replied that I thought the Congress of the United States should take the responsibility rather than have the President of the United States take all the responsibility for the pending legislation. The report of the majority of the committee was filed on the 5th day of September, 1914. I obtained permission from the House of Representatives on the 8th day of September to file within five legislative days the minority report, and the minority report was filed on the 13th day of September. And nothing has been heard from the other side of the House, with their great majority, in regard to this bill until we are confronted to-day with a bill which no one has had a chance to understand or consider. We are met with a bill to-day without any hearings having been held upon it, without any definite explanation of what it is to be; but we learn from the newspapers that it was agreed to in a Democratic caucus held last night. It is not even printed for the information of the House, and yet we have this bill brought before us for final action and debate limited to three hours.

At the time the original hearing was held before the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries it was represented that a great emergency then existed; that we could not wait for anything to be done except to act upon the bill that was then presented. It was suggested there by one of the members of the committee that we should admit the vessels mentioned in the bill to the coastwise trade, and when that proposition was brought to the attention of the committee I made the suggestion that if that subject were introduced it would mean a delay in any final action on the bill, whether that delay occurred in this House or in the other body at the northerly end of the Capitol, and that such a proposition would lead to interminable debate. Consequently that project was thrown aside, although the Secretary of the Treasury kindly informed us that he himself had no objection to that proposition, and that he would like to see it carried into effect.

Mr. Speaker, allusion has been made to the fact that the party now in power has its first opportunity to bring in a bill for the building up of the American merchant marine in the presentation of this Government-ownership bill. If I recollect rightly, when the Panama Canal bill was passed an amendment was placed upon that bill that brought out the exact Democratic theory, and that was the right to buy ships in the markets of the world. That has always been the Democratic argument in opposition to every proposition that we put up to build up the merchant marine—that if they only had the right to go into the markets of the world to buy ships they could build up a merchant marine.

The Panama Canal act provided that vessels could be bought in the markets of the world, but that vessels thus purchased should not be over five years of age. That provision of the bill was tested. Not a single vessel was bought under that proposition. Then that limitation was stricken from the bill, in order that all who desired might buy with perfect freedom—buy vessels of any age, in any way that they could get them. That finally resulted in no purchase of vessels, and at last a ship-registry bill was provided. Unfortunately, I did not happen to be present in the House when the bill was brought up and hastily rushed through the House, but a ship-registry bill was provided, and it was put in the discretion of the President of the United States to provide that foreign watch officers might be engaged to act in charge of these vessels thus purchased if it was found necessary. That bill finally passed both branches of Congress, and the next day thereafter the signature of the President was attached to that bill. He also granted the right to put foreign watch officers on every one of these vessels granted an American registry, and then an attempt was made to put these vessels into the coastwise trade of the United States, but this attempt failed of consummation by the action of the Senate.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I decline to yield.

Now, the coastwise trade of the United States was established in 1787, and when that trade was established it was provided that it should be confined to American-owned, American-built, and American-officered vessels; and this proposed extreme change in policy was one that I am sure would not be made with the approval of the American people. Some of the most prominent Democrats I know called my attention to the fact that the admission of such vessels, with such officers to take charge of the same, to the coastwise trade would be an unwise act that would take away our means of defense, which had been practically provided for by the men who had manned these vessels year after year since the coastwise trade was established in 1787.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Is it not true that the United Fruit Co. of Massachusetts and the Standard Oil Co. and the United States Steel Corporation were the ship companies that asked to have the law extended as to the captains and watch officers?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I do not know who asked for it. I am not familiar with the action, except as I read of it in the newspapers. But I do know the President granted that privilege, whoever asked for it, without stopping to consider the importance of the question, after the Congress had given him the discretion to act.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Is it not an interesting fact that the administration yielded so readily to the request of the United Fruit Co., the Standard Oil Co., and the United States Steel Corporation?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Yes. It is peculiar, because the Democrats have been abusing the Standard Oil Co. and the United States Steel Corporation and the United Fruit Co. for, lo, these many years. That has been their stock argument ever since they have been in existence.

But, gentlemen, I find that my time is so limited, and I have promised so much of the time granted to me to others, that I have very little time that I am privileged to occupy myself.

One great argument made by those on this side of the House and those upon the other side who have opposed subsidies to vessels in the foreign trade was that if we subsidized vessels and put them into the over-seas trade, it would cause an increase in freight rates, and that if an increase in freight rates resulted the farmer would be injured, because he would have to pay larger freight rates. Now, the fact is that since the breaking out of the war—and that terrible war is the cause of everything troublesome now with our friends on the other side of the aisle—it is true freight rates have been very largely increased, but the price of farm products does not seem to have been reduced, and as far as I have been able to ascertain the farmer delivers his freight at the dock in this country and the man who buys the farm product across the broad ocean pays the freight.

Mr. GORDON. The consumer pays the freight.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Yes; the consumer on the other side of the water pays the freight. Therefore the argument that has been presented heretofore on this side and on the other side of the aisle has been dispelled, and if no other proposition has been settled by the discussions arising from the great European war that one proposition has been shown to have no foundation in fact.

Now, gentlemen, I shall not take any more time myself, although I would be glad to do so if time would admit. I desire to yield to gentlemen who undoubtedly will be able to present this case much better than I am able to present it myself. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] 15 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, upon this bill the fundamental propositions in controversy are few. In the short time allotted to me I wish to discuss two propositions which have not had the attention which I think their importance deserves. They may be stated as follows:

First. What will be the international status of the ships procured under this bill?

Second. Can these ships carry contraband without violating our neutrality and possibly involving us in war?

The second proposition is dependent upon the answer to the first.

As to the status of these ships the supporters of the bill take the position that inasmuch as a corporation is provided for to acquire the ships, and the United States is only a majority stockholder, and inasmuch as it is expressly provided that the ships shall be regarded in all respects as private ships are regarded, that therefore no foreign power can claim that they are public ships or subject to any different rules or treatment than private ships would be. While this is the contention of the supporters of the bill their position has not been sustained, and it can not be. On the contrary, in our international relations these ships are Government ships, and they may be so treated by any foreign power. The only effect of the creation of the corporation proposed in the bill will be to give to any foreign power the option of treating them as either Government or private ships.

Upon this proposition I would observe, first, that any laws that we may make can not bind any foreign power. We can not make a law regarding our own affairs and then declare to Germany or Great Britain that they are bound by what we have done to limit any rights that they might otherwise have. The form of the ownership amounts to nothing internationally. If we, the Government of the United States, own them to the extent of exercising control over them as a proprietor, and we will do so under this bill, we can not escape responsibility to a foreign Government by declaring we have created a corporation in which we are the principal stockholder and the title is in the name of the corporation. The question will be, "Does the Government of the United States control them to the same extent as if operated directly by it?" The answer must be "Yes," otherwise the only reason given for the passage of this bill would disappear. If, then, the Government controls them, then the Government is responsible for whatever they may do.

International law is well settled as to this proposition. I shall give only two short quotations from Moore's Digest of International Law, page 878:

> The measure of a neutral's obligations is to be found in the rules of international law, and it can not shelter itself by the allegation that its own legislation imposes a laxer standard on its subjects.
> The duties of neutrality by the law of nations can not be either expanded or contracted by national legislation.

This last quotation is from a great Democratic Secretary of State, Mr. Bayard.

I have searched diligently all the arguments that have been made in behalf of the bill to find some authority for the claim that the United States has the right to shield itself behind a corporation, so far as our international relations are concerned, but have found not one. The eminent advocates of this legislation either can not understand or willfully misunderstand the point involved. They cite a number of bank cases where the sovereign power was a stockholder, and the question at issue was whether the corporation bank was subject to suit in the Federal courts. It has been uniformly held that in such a case the sovereign power could not interpose as a defense its sovereign capacity. But that question is not in issue at all here. Everyone must admit that the United States may waive its sovereign rights by the creation of a corporation in the manner proposed in this bill. If a foreign power chooses so to do, it may treat its ships as private ships and subject them to the international law relating to private ships. That is not in issue. The issue is whether a foreign power is bound to do so. Will a foreign power have the right to treat them as public ships and hold the United States responsible for them, if they choose so to do? The answer must be "Yes." We may waive our sovereign rights over these ships, but we can not waive our sovereign responsibilities.

The tremendous importance of this will be seen in the discussion of the second proposition, "Can these ships carry contraband without violating our neutrality and possibly involving us in war?"

Granted that these are public ships, for which we are in our sovereign capacity responsible to foreign powers, then it is well settled in international law that they can not carry contraband at all without violating our neutrality. A citizen may carry contraband in his private ship and his doing so will not violate the neutrality of his Government. He takes the risk of capture and confiscation of his cargo, but that is all. The Government can not carry contraband at all without violating its neutrality.

Again quoting from Moore's Digest of International Law, page 865:

> It is no offense, either against the law of nations or against our neutrality statutes, for a citizen of the United States to sell munitions of war to a belligerent; yet it could scarcely be contended that the Government would be justified in employing its agents to promote such transactions.

Do I need to argue that if these ships carry contraband these ships would be an agency of the Government to promote the transaction?

The reason for the exemption of the Government from violation of its neutrality by the act of one of its citizens in carrying contraband is stated in Woolsey, International Law, sections 193 and 194. I quote:

> If the neutral (Government) should send powder or balls, cannon or rifles, this would be a direct encouragement of the war, and so a departure from the neutral position. * * * Now, the same wrong is committed when a private trader, without the privity of his Government, furnishes the means of war to either of the warring parties. It may be made a question whether such conduct on the part of the private citizen ought not to be prevented by his Government, even as enlistments for foreign armies on neutral soil are made penal. But it is claimed to be difficult for a Government to watch narrowly the operation of trade, and it is annoying for the innocent trader. Moreover, the neutral ought not to be subjected by the quarrels of others to additional care and expense. Hence, by the practice of nations, he is passive in regard to violations of the rules concerning contraband, blockade, and the like, and leaves the policy of the sea and the punishing or reprisal power in the hands of those who are most interested, the limits being fixed for the punishment by common usage or law. * * * It is admitted that the act of carrying to the enemy articles directly useful in war is a wrong, for which the injured party may punish the neutral taken in the act.

Here the reason for the distinction between a private trader and a Government ship, so far as neutrality is concerned, is made plain, and it is the law.

It must, then, be admitted that if these are public ships they can not carry contraband at all without violation of our neutrality, while private ships may do so. This brings us to a consideration of what constitutes contraband of war. Our own

Supreme Court has defined contraband of war to be articles manufactured and primarily and ordinarily used for military purposes in time of war. Articles which may be and are used for purposes of war or peace are contraband only when actually destined to the military or naval use of a belligerent. The United States has had a fairly consistent policy in the treatment and definition of contraband of war, but the practice of other nations is involved in hopeless confusion and inconsistencies. A careful study compels one to the conclusion that there is practically nothing produced that at some time or other has not been declared contraband by the great powers of the world. In our war with Spain we find in the list of absolute contraband, horses; in the list of conditional contraband, coal. England once declared contraband all grain, flour, or meal bound to any port in France. In 1885 France declared rice destined to certain portions of China as contraband. In 1905, in its war with Japan, Russia placed cotton upon the contraband list. Without giving further instances, we all know what is happening in the present war. The list of contraband articles is being enlarged every month, and it is impossible to say from day to day what has been declared to be contraband by one or the other of the belligerent powers. In the case of a private trader these are the chances that he takes, but let a Government ship have a cargo that England or Germany declares to be contraband, and we may be immediately met with the charge of having violated our neutrality, the result of which might be war. Because of the inexcusable limitations of time, this question can not be given such discussion as its importance deserves, and I must content myself with this very imperfect presentation.

To sum up, the ships provided for in this bill will be public ships, so far as foreign powers are concerned, if they choose to so regard them, and we in our sovereign capacity will be responsible for their operation. These ships can not carry contraband at all without violating our neutrality. As to what is contraband is so uncertain that we could not, without the risk of grave complications, engage in trade at all with any of the belligerent countries. If we can not engage in trade with them, then the reason for the bill fails.

Mr. MARTIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I am afraid I can not. If I have time, I will yield later.

There is another phase of the matter which I would like to discuss, but I have not the time. I can only state the proposition. It is: These ships, being public ships, must not discriminate against any of the belligerents in the trade carried on by them. If they do, we violate our neutrality. If this bill passes many in this country will insist that these ships engage in the German trade, on the ground that English ships are constantly carrying cargoes from the United States to England; and, therefore, if we would be strictly neutral, that we should devote the ships to the German trade to equalize our exports. To this England would strenuously object. Aside from the international complications involved, there would be complications at home, public opinion would become inflamed, and consequences might follow which would be most unfortunate.

Mr. Speaker, serious and delicate questions are daily arising, and I will not vote for this bill and add uncounted new ones. A vote against the bill can work no serious injury. Every Member who votes for it, if it should become a law, may regret his vote to his dying day.

Some gentlemen on the other side of the aisle treat this matter lightly. The day may come—God knows we all hope it will not—when you may realize that instead of blindly following any man, however great and patriotic he may be, you owed it to your country in this hour to vote your own convictions and not those of some one else's. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] 10 minutes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I can not begin without thanking the gentleman who has just spoken [Mr. LENROOT] for his careful presentation of the dangers of this bill. But there is danger also in the way that this bill comes forward. It is not merely that it was reported six months ago and now comes before this House as a caucus measure at the end of the session, but that we have heard it stated that gentlemen have been assured that unless it is passed in the few remaining days of this session there will be an extra session. That means that every Member of this House is threatened with a sentence of six months' confinement at hard labor in a tropical climate, away from home, and likewise that he will be sentenced to pay expenses, and so be fined at least $1,000; and he is also told, if the statement in the morning papers be true, that such an extra session would be the political suicide of gentlemen on the other side of the aisle. How can a great measure be considered under those circumstances, with no power of amendment and only the power to say "No"?

I am going to give only two thoughts as to this bill, full as it is of features which are subject to criticism.

The first four sections are known as the Weeks bill. They provide that the ships of the United States Navy shall be fully manned with retired officers, civilians, and new enlistments, and that the Navy shall be got ready for use; and that meanwhile, as we have an exigency in our foreign trade, especially with South America, those ships which can be spared shall be used in that foreign trade. When that bill was passed in the Senate it was insisted and admitted that it was a temporary measure to meet a temporary exigency and to be passed now for that exigency. This present bill passes the Weeks Act not for this exigency but for kingdom come; not for the needs of the present trade, not for the needs that may come upon us because of the danger of war and the need for enlarging our Navy, but to be without effect until two years after the European war shall have ended and shall have been so declared by the President. It reminds me in its value of a will that was probated, in which a man reserved to himself the use of his real and personal property at the resurrection. And if it is a comfort to the majority party who have introduced this proposition to know that that will was sustained as not made by an absolutely insane man, I will give them that consolation; but the good of the Weeks bill is gone when it is postponed until the need for it will not exist.

How many minutes have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has six minutes remaining.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I am anxious to yield back some of my time. The rest of this bill is a novelty. It was reported six months ago. It proposes that the United States of America shall own or control a corporation which shall buy, build, equip, or charter merchant ships. There are none to be had anywhere except those in harbor belonging to one of the belligerents. Any other ships must be built. This corporation has leave to charter its ships to whom it pleases, and to do business under a shipping board composed of political officials who know nothing about it. The only ships that it can get are useless as freighters, and that is the only kind of ships for which there is a demand. These fast ships are ocean liners meant for passengers, and very few people are going to Europe to spend their money there now. These provisions bring us at least into a doubtful realm with reference to our relations with foreign countries, for while they provide that we shall not do anything with those ships that is not neutral, the very purchase is doubtful as to neutrality. Such provisions imperil this country, and for no good. They drive Americans out of the shipping trade instead of encouraging them to go into it. We want Americans at sea.

I will say only one word more. I am ready to stand for postal or freight subsidies, as other countries have done, or for a tonnage subsidy, but I have always proposed something that I thought better, and that was to pay the difference in cost between the running of an American ship and a foreign ship, which is caused by the cost of American labor. I was always ready to vote for a bill which would say that the United States would pay to any shipowner the difference in cost of the labor of the captain and crew that was aboard the American ship, compared with a foreign ship, or, if necessary, more than the difference, but based on the men being there and their being enlisted in a naval reserve. [Applause.]

That is a single and separate proposition, and would go directly to the evil that prevents Americans being at sea. I have no time to debate it now. If this bill were before the House, I would offer that bill as a substitute, because I believe that the country and the House are determined to have something that will induce Americans to go back on the seas. Unfortunately this is an act to prevent their going back on the seas. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 12 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania ought to have a better audience, and I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of no quorum, and the Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and thirty-two Members present—not a quorum.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following-named Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this call 289 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to me a moment?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the attention of this side of the House for a moment. We have consumed a little over one hour in debate this morning and an hour in roll calls. It will be impossible to get through with this bill by midnight unless Members remain in the Chamber and maintain a quorum at all times. There are two or three more appropriation bills still pending, and those who have a lingering hope of getting away from here on the 4th of March will simply destroy that hope by not remaining here, and thus wasting the time.

Mr. HENRY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Certainly.

Mr. HENRY. I will state that some Members did not catch the terms of the rule this morning and think that the bill will be read for amendment under the five-minute rule. I think the gentleman should explain that at the end of the six hours' debate the vote will be on the bill and the pending amendments.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; the rule provides that at the close of the debate the previous question will be ordered and the vote will come on the bill and amendments to final passage. Members must realize that we lose half an hour or more on every roll call.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I hope the admonition of my friend from Missouri will be given due attention, because there is not a quorum of the House here now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes that Democrats will all stay here.

Mr. MANN. The Speaker knows the Republicans will.

The SPEAKER. And he also invites the Republicans. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Oh, we will stay.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr Speaker, I yield 12 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I do not wonder the Democrats do not want to remain in the House during the discussion of this bill; a great many of them have consciences and they do not want to break records for personal independence that up to this time have been creditable. The bill they are asked to support, partly at the dictation of the White House and partly because of the party caucus, is a bill which does not propose to build up American industries; it is a wreckage bill pure and simple. Gentlemen on the other side have suggested that opposition to this bill comes from the so-called Shipping Trust. None are better posted in regard to the Shipping Trust than the gentlemen who make that allegation; there is absolutely no information on this side, so far as I know, concerning any such institution. The Democratic Party will again reverse its professions about the trusts if it passes this bill. It will do this even at the risk of forsaking the plain people, for whom it has professed such undying love. The Democrats used to inveigh against the Guggenheims in Alaska, and it was charged that certain privileges were being granted to extend railroads in that country. Then Democrats were on the alert; they had a great deal of information about the Guggenheims and the great railroad trusts and private monopolies, but it did not take long after the present administration came into power to pass an Alaskan government-ownership bill for the very purpose of buying out the so-called Railroad Trust in Alaska, and if our information be true, that is what is actually occurring under the direction of this administration.

When the railroads of the country were complaining because the freight rates were insufficient and because they were losing money, notwithstanding the Democrats for 16 long years had denounced the railroads and had made all sorts of charges against railroad trusts, 62 very distinguished railroad men and representatives of the "big interests," most of them coming direct from Wall Street, called upon the President of the United States, and shortly thereafter a statement was issued from that quarter indicating that the railroads of the country ought to have a fair show, and that perhaps there had been too much hue and cry against the so-called railroad trusts. That the railroads themselves are not now so unfavorably regarded by this administration has been demonstrated during the last few days, when the Interstate Commerce Commission, in its freight-rate ruling, has indicated that the railroads ought to be preferred even as against the Panama Canal. These things should not be forgotten when we are discussing trusts.

Mr. Speaker, gentlemen who raise the cry of "the Shipping Trust" against the men who oppose this bill desire to get from under. They seek to find a refuge from the wrath of the people whom they intend, in this instance, to rob to the extent of $30,000,000, direct taxation, for the purpose of buying foreign ships and putting American shipyards and American workingmen out of business. Some of the gentlemen who have spoken, and, in particular, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], have called this bill a bill to build up the American merchant marine. That is a grave mistake. This is a bill to buy foreign ships built in foreign shipyards, not for the purpose of building up an American merchant marine, but for the purpose of transferring the business of building ships from American shipyards, where American wages are paid, to foreign shipyards, where cheap foreign labor prevails.

Gentlemen have intimated that there is a reason for the passage of this bill, because it is said that freight charges have become excessive on the high seas. When a man owns a vessel and there is a great demand for that vessel to carry freight, it is no more unnatural or illogical that he should ask a higher rate of freight for that service which is so greatly in demand than that the cotton planters of the South should combine not to sell their cotton until they obtain a certain price. But gentlemen have contended, and particularly the President of the United States and his very active Secretary of the Treasury have urged, that it is because of excessive freight rates in ocean carrying business; that there is a necessity for buying these foreign ships and taking this American money and transferring it to foreign shipyards, thus displacing American labor. In this regard they are in error. I have said in one or two previous addresses here that there is no abnormal congestion of freight on ordinary business at the various ports in this country. The congestion is due to speculation because of war conditions. I have read into the RECORD statements from men who know, not collectors of the ports nor men who have been solicited for their opinion by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Commerce, nor men who are brokers for the purchase of ships, but men actually in the business of shipping and men who to-day will find all of the ships that are necessary to carry the normal business of the country. They say ships are still to be had and that legitimate business is being relieved. Who, then, is it that wants to purchase these foreign ships, and what is the purpose in making the purchase?

There is heavy pressure on the part of those who desire to send cotton out of the country. Cotton is going out in greater quantities than ever before. The Bureau of the Census proves that in its January report.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. I can not. There is heavy pressure on the part of those who want to send oil out of the country. Oil is going out in tremendous quantities. There is heavy pressure on the part of those who want to send steel and war munitions out of the country. That means trouble for the country. But if you have any doubt about who wants this ship-purchase bill passed, about who wants the people to pay $30,000,000 for these foreign ships, I recur, for historical reasons, to that interesting conference at the White House in August last, just prior to the passage of the war-risk bill. The gentlemen on the other side of the House, it will be remembered, rushed the war-risk bill through in great haste about that time.

Some of you have said that the Republicans voted for that bill. I question whether a dozen on this side voted for it—Republicans and Progressives put together. It was a Democratic bill, and you are entitled to all the credit, if you consider it creditable to spend $5,000,000 of the people's money in that way. But since this shipping bill is up, I want you to recall the circumstances under which the war-risk bill was passed. Do you remember who it was representing the "big interests" who went to the White House to discuss this and other matters? Let me read to you the names of a few of the 62 who went there with the eminently respectable Seth Low, of New York, as chairman: Mr. Samuel Rea, president of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., was one, an excellent Democrat and a great railroad engineer. Remember, the discussion was about freight rates and the necessity of taking $5,000,000 of the people's money and putting it into the business of insuring risks for those who wanted to send contraband to sea. There was too much risk in this, even for the marine insurance companies. They were willing the Government, which means the people, should take it. Mr. Alfred H. Smith, president of the New York Central Railroad Co., was another of these gentlemen; Mr. Jacob H. Schiff, of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., who deny they are interested in the purchase of foreign ships or have any direct connection with the Hamburg-American Line or any other line, was another one of them; Mr. J. Pierpont Morgan—it is not necessary for me to state who he is—was another of these gentlemen; and so was Mr. Frank H. Vanderlip, president of the National City Bank; and that other distinguished representative of "big interests," to whose great organization reference was made a few moments ago by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER], Mr. James H. Farrell, president of the United States Steel Corporation. There were 62 of them in all, and pretty heavy financial timber. Oh, but what a reversal of opinion there was either before or after that visit! Oh, how those who had been proclaiming "the rights of the downtrodden people" began to see a new light! Oh, how those who had been denouncing "the trusts" of the country changed their views after this memorable visit of the illustrious 62! And, by the way, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] asked the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] whether it was not the United States Steel Trust that had asked to register its ships under the American flag, and the answer was "Yes." Why was that question asked unless your war-risk bill was framed, not for the benefit of the poor people of this country, not for the benefit of the ordinary shippers, but for the benefit of the United States Steel Trust or the great corporations whom you have seen fit heretofore to denounce?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. No; I can not——

Mr. ALEXANDER. I simply desired——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. MOORE. I have but 12 minutes and the gentleman from Missouri has ample time. Oh, there is a congestion of freight, is there? That is the reason you want to pass this bill. Look over the report which Secretary McAdoo and Secretary Redfield sent to the Senate of the United States, and see how this thing was built up; see what splendid press agency work was done; see how the collectors of the ports were made use of; see how the Cabinet relied upon the men who knew how to buy ships at a high price and sell at a low price. When you have done this you will begin to get some light upon the subject. Congestion in business at the ports! No ships to carry freight! I want to submit that in the month of January, 1915, there were enough ships to carry more cotton and grain than was carried through half the year in 1914. In the single month of January, 1915, we exported on ships, which were obtainable, from all ports save that of New York—and the New York figures are not yet compiled by the Department of Commerce—we transported a total in value of foodstuffs from the United States into foreign countries, with a plentitude of ships to carry it, $41,579,756, as against $11,042,318 in January, 1914. Nearly four times as much was sent out on ships in January, 1915, as we sent out in January, 1914. In bushels for the month of January, 1915, from all ports except that of New York—and New York exports were also exceptional, as will be seen when the figures come in—we sent out in bushels of wheat, January, 1915, 18,906,545 or nearly 19,000,000 bushels, as against 4,985,148 bushels in 1914; about four times as much in January, 1915, as we sent out in the month of January, 1914. As to cotton and oil——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. METZ].

Mr. METZ. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I want to be understood as being opposed on principle to governmental ownership and fads of that kind. I call them fads, but we are up against the proposition to-day, and while we hear about the doctrines of Jefferson and others, it is to be remembered that they are all dead and we are right here. I think changing our navigation laws would solve the problem, but we have not the nerve to do it. The Republicans for 20 years did not have the nerve to do it; so we must find some other remedy. I am a shipper, and I represent shippers. Cotton and wheat are not the only things in this world. Other products are handled, and to-day I am obliged, in bringing cargoes from Europe, to pay 75 shillings a ton as against 20 shillings before the war, and I am asked to sign a contract for a year at that rate and to bind myself not to ship a pound by any other line. That is no new condition; we have always had that, especially to New York. Now, who pays it? Some one made the remark that in normal times the shipper pays the freight, as in the case of the wheat grower the price is fixed in Liverpool. I will concede that to this extent, that the export price of wheat and cotton, for instance, is fixed in Liverpool. I will take wheat, and not cotton, as an illustration. That price includes the freight to Liverpool, which is added to the price of the wheat. Now, when the Shipping Trust, the trust you are all speaking about, or the shipping monopoly, has got hold of you, it fixes the freight rate, which, plus the cost of the wheat, makes the price in Liverpool; but suppose that some firm in Liverpool brings goods on from South America on other lines, or a competing line, at a much lower freight rate. The grower in South America gets a much higher price than the farmer in the United States, and to that extent the freight is paid by the shipper. In all other cases not analogous the ultimate consumer pays it.

Now, then, there is some talk about buying interned ships. I would buy every one of them except the big passenger ships, and take chances on the complications. I do not think we ought to buy any ship of over 10,000 tons. It is a freight traffic we want and not a passenger traffic. I hope sometime the law will be amended so that bought ships can go into the coastwise trade, so that a ship carrying cotton from Galveston to Europe ought to be permitted to bring a return cargo to New York, and there take on a coastwise cargo, instead of being compelled to go back to Galveston in ballast for more cargo.

I do not want this arrangement permanent, but I am opposed to a time limitation in the bill. If you put in this law now the clause to stop it in two years after the war, the steamship people will know in two years that we will be out of business, and lie back and keep up the rates, and buy your ships for junk at that time. If, however, after two years, competition has brought down rates so low that the ships do not pay, no Congress will go on very long appropriating funds and run at a deficit. On the present basis I do not care what you pay for a ship, it will pay for itself in a year's time, even if freight can only be had for one way, and the return is made in ballast. Figure it yourselves. I have had occasion to do so. You can afford to scrap all your ships in two or three years, and still save money for the people on to-day's rates, if they were maintained.

Mr. MANN. Why would a man sell it then?

Mr. METZ. All right; if he will not sell, then you will not get any. What are you kicking about if nobody will sell them? [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. You may get them at a very high price.

Mr. METZ. If you are going to put crooks in office who will do that kind of thing, that is up to us. I do not propose to have that kind of men if I can help it, and I do not believe our President does. We want goods that are under embargo, such as rubber and wool. You may send them in English bottoms. You go to South America for a load of rubber, and what will they tell you? It is British property, and it must be transported in a British ship. I guarantee if it was down there and was your property you could bring it in American bottoms; but you can not do it to-day. You have not the bottoms to send. Those are the things that are going to count.

I claim the credit of sending the first ship abroad with an American flag when this war broke out. The marine insurance on some of the cargo she brought went to 17 per cent. Our boats are not built for trans-Atlantic traffic, but for coastwise traffic. The Holland-American Line ran 70 boats out of Rotterdam in October and November, all loaded with freight for American ports.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. METZ. They chartered Danish, Norwegian, Swedish—any kind of a boat except American. They could not afford to take those. Among them was the steamer Laura—an old tub that took 44 days to cross the Atlantic with freight for this country. Now, when we send goods abroad, unless they go in American boats, they are held up by the English Government. You can not afford to charter a boat of any kind and have it held up in England three or four weeks on a time charter. American boats will not be held up long; and they will not be held up if we show backbone in this administration, and I am willing to say that we have it.

Mr. MADDEN. Would the gentleman be willing to take a chance on war?

Mr. METZ. If my rights are attacked, I would be willing to take a chance on any kind of war. When anybody tells me I can not do anything I have a right to do, I am going to fight for that right. When I am told I can not send foodstuffs here or there, I for one would fight for my right to do so. We do not have to be dictated to. If we do buy interned ships, we can use them—can release vessels now going to South America for other ports.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Has any consideration been given in committee or Democratic caucus to this question of return cargoes—at length?

Mr. METZ. I can assure you it was discussed in Democratic caucus with all the knowledge at our command. You can not get return cargoes from all ports at the present time. Of course, it depends on where you go——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Has not that something to do with it?

Mr. METZ. The trust ships have return cargoes. The ships that have not return cargoes are the ships we are sending with cotton to German ports. I can get cheaper ocean freight rates on my goods from Germany to New York by sending them by railroad to Bremen, and get as low a rate of insurance out of Bremen as any other port, as I can on the Holland-American Line from Rotterdam, with its cheaper water rate down the Rhine to Rotterdam. The shipowners have got us. That is all there is to it. If this is only a club with which to break in, I am willing to spend $30,000,000 to show that we can do it. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, you gentleman on the other side of the House have 145 majority, and, of course, you can pass any bill that you propose. Only part of the bill we are proposing to pass is before the House. Certain amendments were made last night by the Democratic caucus that are not yet in print, and yet the Representatives of the American people on the floor of this House are called upon to enact a law that is not before them.

Mr. PADGETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I decline to yield to anybody now. You are bound by caucus action. You have no right to think for yourselves. You are trying to jam something through this House that the American people do not want. Legislation is no longer enacted by the House as a deliberative body. It is brought in here after deliberation all night in a Democratic caucus. This bill was prepared on the outside. Nobody in here had anything to do with its preparation. You propose to spend $50,000,000 of the people's money to enter upon a doubtful enterprise at a time when everybody is taxed beyond his power to bear it, and when more than 4,000,000 American workmen are out of employment. And this will not give employment to any American workmen—not one. You are opening employment bureaus everywhere now. It would be much better for the American people if you would open the workshops and the factories and give them a chance to make a livelihood. [Applause on the Republican side.]

You keep on taxing the idle people of America on their necessities, adding to their daily burdens by your extravagance and wasteful expenditures of the public money. You continue to empty the Public Treasury at the expense of the necessities of the people. You authorize the organization of a ship company in this bill. You give that company $10,000,000 out of the Public Treasury. You authorize the issue of $30,000,000 of bonds, and perhaps $40,000,000, as the case may be. You add the opportunity for this corporation to increase by $10,000,000 more the capital that they may employ. You authorize the shipping board to repeal all the navigation laws and to make any kind of laws they please, but you give them no power whatever, when this bill ends, to restore the navigation laws under which America works.

You are engaging in competition with private enterprise. You are endangering the peace of America. You are going to carry contraband to the belligerent nations. You are going to violate the neutrality of America and involve the people of America in trouble with Europe. Can you afford to do it simply for the purpose of enacting a law, under whip and spur, because the Secretary of the Treasury and the President of the United States demand it? You have made it a party measure by dictation from the President of the United States. This ought not to be a party measure. This is a business proposition, in which every citizen of the United States is interested. You will buy ships at an extravagant price and you will sell them for a song when you get through with this thing, after it proves to be a failure.

You give away the power of Congress to legislate and place it in this shipping board when you authorize the shipping board to make navigation laws. You throw the people of the United States into a condition of uncertainty and fear. You destroy their activity by the uncertainty which you create, to say nothing about the burdens which you will lay upon them in the matter of increased taxation to meet the whims of those who want to enter upon the purchase of these ships in order that they may satisfy their ideas of Government ownership.

The country is opposed to this legislation. There have been protests from every section of the country against the enactment of this bill. The people of the country are impatiently waiting for the time to come when they can express their opinions in opposition to this character of legislation at the ballot box, and in November, 1916, the Democratic Party will no longer have an opportunity to foist upon the American people such iniquitous and nefarious legislation as is proposed in this bill. Pass it if you will, but remember that you will be held accountable by a long-suffering people for your action. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, how much time has the gentleman used?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has used six minutes, and has yielded back four minutes.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, we upon this side admire the performance of our Democratic friends to-day. We admire the facility and volubility with which they praise the President on the floor and curse him in the cloakrooms. [Laughter.] We hope that some day you will have the courage of your convictions, and I prophesy now that this is the last bill the President will ever force through Congress against the judgment and the conviction of the majority of his party. [Applause on the Republican side.] I think this is the beginning of the end of his dictatorship.

Now, our Democratic friends come to-day and they desert free ships, discriminating duties downward, a free Panama Canal, and every other remedy that they have ever advocated for the upbuilding of the American merchant marine. And yet the father of all these failures with simple faith comes before the country to-day and insists that this last misshapen and sickly child, born of socialism and cupidity, is the only thing that will give us a merchant marine, and in order to demonstrate that they are right, with true Democratic logic, they point with pride to the fact that heretofore they have always been wrong. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, what is the exact question before us to-day? The exact question is, Shall we purchase the interned German ships? That is the question. If you were to do away with that proposition, the enthusiasm for this bill would disappear in 24 hours. If that is not the purpose of this bill, then the whole proposition is childishly absurd. There are no other vessels to be purchased.

There is a distinct conviction throughout the country to-day that there is some understanding between those who control the Hamburg-American vessels and certain distinguished gentlemen who are insistently urging this legislation. Whether it is true or not there is an aroma surrounding this bill to-day that has already condemned it in public opinion.

What is the position of foreign countries in regard to the purchase of these interned ships? Let me read it to you:

The transfer of an enemy vessel to a neutral flag, effected after the outbreak of hostilities, is void unless it is proved that such transfer was not made in order to evade the consequences to which the enemy vessel as such is exposed.

That is the position of the allies. What is the position of Germany? Let me read that, as declared on the 4th day of last August:

Ships that after the outbreak of hostilities have been transferred from the enemy to a neutral flag are also to be considered as enemy ships.

Those declarations are plain. Anyone can understand them. It does not take a lawyer to construe them. And the very moment that we buy one of these vessels and start to run it upon the high seas, that moment it is subject to seizure, and that moment we must be prepared to defend ourselves against Germany or against Russia, Japan, France, and Great Britain.

Now, suppose that one of these vessels is seized. It is taken into a foreign port. We protest. And suppose that protest is refused. They will do the construing of the law in their court in their country. Then what? Then we are placed in the cowardly and pussilanimous position where we must either say that we are right but have not the courage to enforce that right or else we must go to war.

Now, are we prepared to take that position? That is the question to-day that, above all others, we are to consider in the passage of this bill. It is not our duty to see how nearly we can come to war and escape it. It is our duty to keep as far away from war as possible.

It is our duty to-day above all things else, not only for our own country but for the sake of humanity, to maintain neutrality, and to maintain that neutrality with honor. Now the question is, Shall we to-day, for the small benefit that might come, embark upon this new and untried socialistic path condemned by experience and by the common sense of mankind? Are we going to take chances of being involved in the greatest conflict that has ever devastated this planet for the little advantage that might come to us, even if we concede that this bill would do all its friends claim for it?

The greatest question in regard to the passage of this bill is this: Shall we, on account of an anxiety on the part of some for the dollar; shall we, because of a desire to purchase a few secondhand ships, and run them in the foreign trade, so long as we run them at a loss; shall we, for the sake of being able to get a few bales of cotton or a few bushels of wheat to Europe for a few cents less; shall we weigh these things in the balance against our country's peace and perhaps our country's existence?

May we be saved from the madness of such leadership, intoxicated with a little brief authority, and may we remain in the paths of peace and national honor. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yields back four minutes.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman from Missouri now occupy some time?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL].

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Speaker, in view of the attitude of the Republican Party as illustrated in the remarks upon this bill to-day by members of that party in the House, a declaration made some time ago is peculiarly interesting and significant. I will read it:

Our present dependence upon foreign shipping for nine-tenths of our foreign carrying trade is a great loss to the industry of this country. It is also a serious danger to our trade, for its sudden withdrawal in the event of European war would seriously cripple our expanding foreign commerce. The national defense and naval efficiency of this country, moreover, supply a compelling reason for legislation which will enable us to recover our former place among the trade-carrying fleets of the world.

That is a quotation from the Republican national platform of 1900, in which the Republican Party, deploring the condition of our foreign trade and our merchant marine, prophesied the condition which we are experiencing to-day. They are certainly entitled to the distinction of being a true prophet of evil, because that which they prophesied has arrived, and in tragic form.

There can be no doubt of the fact that an emergency confronts us. We have to-day of American vessels registered for foreign shipping of all sizes only a little more than 1,000,000 tons, about 2 per cent of the world's gross tonnage. There is a dearth of foreign ships to be added to the insignificant number of American ships with which to carry our commerce. Evidence can be multiplied, so that the most skeptical must be convinced that at the ports of our country American farm products and manufactured products of various kinds, noncontraband products if you please, are demanding carriage across the sea in order to be delivered to those who are willing to purchase them and able to pay for them. What is the attitude of the Republican Party in view of its professions in 1900, which have been repeated in scarcely less emphatic language in every national platform since that time? Although in power in the executive and legislative branches for almost 20 years, that party has done absolutely nothing to revive the American merchant marine in our foreign trade.

It is true that in the Fifty-sixth Congress, and in several Congresses succeeding, the Republican Party endeavored to report and pass a subsidy bill. But that bill was so full of favoritism, and it was so plainly recognized to be the covert of selfish interests, that even the Republican Party in the House, in a large majority at that time, would not support it. The public sentiment of the country in both parties is opposed to subsidies.

What other remedy has been proposed? That of discriminating duties, which also had the approval of the national Republican Party in its platform. And yet it remained for a Democratic Congress, in framing the Underwood-Simmons tariff bill, to place in it a discriminating duty of 5 per cent. That was not sufficient. In my opinion, it ought to be larger. And yet that is the only legislation upon our statute books in 50 years by either political party of this country intended to enlarge our merchant marine in the foreign trade.

Others have suggested that our navigation laws be amended. Yet every Republican and Democrat who is entirely candid will admit that even if it were a practicable remedy and would give the needed relief promptly we could not pass through Congress any repeal of the navigation laws as applicable to our foreign shipping.

So, Mr. Speaker, this condition of our foreign trade has been brought about under Republican control of the Government, and the fact remains that the only legislative effort made for its amelioration has been by the Democratic Party.

Now, in this emergency, which I have briefly described, what is the attitude of the two parties here? What does the Republican Party propose? Absolutely nothing. It has not offered, in either branch of Congress, any constructive piece of legislation intended to give relief to this dearth of shipping, this paralysis of our foreign commerce, to the detriment of our industry and our prosperity. A Democratic President and a Democratic Congress have proposed the pending bill. Certainly in this emergency the Democratic Party confronts the country as the only constructive party, while the Republican Party, with all its boasts of past heritage and achievement, has absolutely nothing to propose in the dire conditions that confront us.

What are the arguments they bring against this measure? They allege that our neutrality will be violated and that we will be in danger of war. Gentlemen know that these professions are insincere, in the face of the attitude of this administration for peace. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON]. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I am very much obliged to my friends for this ovation, and I shall requite it by yielding five minutes to the eloquent gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE] and reserving the remainder of the 30 minutes.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I also yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. EAGLE] five minutes.

Mr. EAGLE. Mr. Speaker, manifestly it is not possible within the brief time at my disposal to-day fully or satisfactorily to discuss the important measure under consideration; and yet I desire as fully as possible to present certain reasons which seem to me conclusive, from its economic aspect, why I should support this measure.

Logically a complete discussion of the subject and of the bill under consideration would involve (1) a statement of relevant facts, and a just conclusion to be drawn as to the necessity or the wisdom of embarking upon the proposed course; (2) the merits of the bill itself, as a whole and in detail; and (3) certain international legal questions which have been urged against the expediency of the policy proposed and of the bill itself.

As to the last-indicated question: Because of the limit of time imposed upon me, I must content myself in passing to say that, having carefully collated, briefed, and considered the prize-court law of each and all of the great powers of the world—the United States, Germany, Great Britain, Austria, Spain, Japan, Italy, Holland, Russia, and France—only France has ever declared any position in that matter denying the citizens of any neutral country the right to purchase, in good faith and for a valuable consideration, from the citizens of any belligerent country merchant ships even after a declaration of war, and even France has never resolutely adhered to that position, having abandoned it at least once upon the insistent representations of the United States and later in the Franco-Prussian war of 1870; and therefore that it would lead the United States into no embarrassing international complications if her citizens, or if the shipping board created by this act, should purchase, during the present European war, ships interned in our ports and belonging to citizens of any of such European belligerents.

As to the details and merits of the bill under consideration: As no serious question has been raised in this debate upon its provisions, I must content myself to state that, in its scope and in its details, it is sensibly constructed to accomplish the purpose intended, namely, to enable the United States to acquire, either by purchase or construction, or both, and to operate, a merchant marine in the interest of the entire American people to accommodate their foreign commerce at a reasonable charge for a regular service under fair conditions.

And therefore my remarks will be limited to a consideration of the economic phase of the subject under discussion.

There is presented here to-day exactly the same party spectacle I have observed during the two years I have served in this body, upon every occasion involving an important issue—the Republican Party is hiding behind some specious pretext to protect special interests, while the Democratic Party is championing the just rights of the masses in their struggle for economic independence and industrial freedom. At the end of two years of extreme trial the Democratic Party, under the leadership of President Wilson, is still a forward-looking party, and continues to take its stand against special privilege in every form and in favor of the principle of the greatest good to the greatest number.

Sir Walter Raleigh said:

Whosoever commands the sea commands trade. Whosoever commands the trade of the world commands the riches of the world, and, consequently, the world itself.

But the United States, as the richest nation in the world, having more than $140,000,000,000 of wealth, occupies admittedly the most insignificant position, in the matter of its merchant marine, of any great nation on earth. For a half century the country has heard much concerning an American merchant marine; but the fact remains that during that period of time the American merchant marine has faded from the high seas, until it is now practically a negligible factor in the world's commerce.

Our country contains only one-fifteenth of the population of the earth, but it produces about 70 per cent of the world's corn, 65 per cent of its petroleum, 63 per cent of its copper, 60 per cent of its cotton, 42 per cent of its iron ore, 40 per cent of its coal, 35 per cent of its tobacco, 30 per cent of its live stock, lead, and silver, 25 per cent of its wheat, and 20 per cent of its timber.

With its 60,000,000 head of cattle, its annual production of 240,000,000 barrels of petroleum, 763,000,000 bushels of wheat, 2,500,000,000 bushels of corn, 60,000,000 tons of iron ore, 550,000,000 tons of coal, and 15,000,000 bales of cotton—its total annual farm products amounting to some $10,000,000,000 and its total manufactures amounting to some $21,000,000,000—after supplying our own people with food, clothing, and manufactures of every sort, out of these enormous resources, the people of this Nation are able annually to ship to foreign countries for sale a total of about $2,500,000,000 of American products, and to buy back from foreign lands for the use and convenience of our own people something like $2,000,000,000 of their products.

I mention these stupendous figures only to illustrate the imperative necessity that, either by private capital or by some form of public ownership, adequate shipping facilities be provided to accommodate this enormous commerce and traffic.

We have realized, since last August when the European war began, how entirely dependent our American commerce is and has been upon foreign bottoms, and how helpless the American people now are in the face of this awful calamity. They have known for many years, in a general way, that this Nation had no adequate merchant marine, and our manufacturers, merchants, and shippers have in many different ways brought to the attention of the Congress the fact that the greater part of American import and export trade was carried in foreign bottoms; and yet the people have deluded themselves with the thought that they had at least a respectable merchant marine. Indeed Lloyd's Register points out that the American merchant marine comprises some 3,100 vessels of more than 5,300,000 tons gross register. But those figures when analyzed are a delusion; for when the number of vessels which are used upon our canals, lakes, bays, and rivers are taken from such total of 3,100 vessels, it leaves only 361 American vessels of 1,375,000 gross tons capacity used or capable of use in our deep-sea shipping. It is the tragedy of this awful European war which has emphasized American marine helplessness.

It was not always true that America had no considerable merchant marine. As late as 1821, 90 per cent of our import and export shipping was done in American bottoms; but the proportion has constantly declined, so that it was 86 per cent in 1831, 83 per cent in 1841, 72 per cent in 1851, and 65 per cent in 1861. Then, during the period of our Civil War, because the Confederate cruisers were able to destroy the American merchantmen at sea, American owners sold their ships to foreigners rather than let them lie idle and go to pieces. For instance, during the period of 1860–1867, the American merchant marine was sold to foreigners in rapidly increasing volume, as is illustrated by the following table:

American ships sold to aliens, 1860–1867.

	Tons.
1860	17,518
1861	26,649
1862	117,756
1863	222,199
1864	300,865
1865	133,832

And in passing it may be remarked that the same nations which are now belligerents in Europe were those which thus bought the American merchant marine when the United States were engaged in war; and yet in this debate gentlemen insist that the citizens of the United States have no right to acquire any of the merchant marine of any of the European belligerents at the present time. It would be interesting to know by what process of reasoning gentlemen justify those countries now belligerent in Europe in purchasing the American merchant marine when we were at war and at the same time deny to the United States the right to purchase in good faith and for a fair price merchant vessels belonging to the citizens of those belligerent European nations now that they are at war.

But even at the end of the Civil War the decline did not cease in the amount of American deep-sea shipping carried in American bottoms, because only 32 per cent was carried in American bottoms in the year 1871, 16 per cent in 1881, 12 per cent in 1891, and only 8 per cent in 1901, while immediately before the outbreak of the European war in August, 1914, it is doubtful if 5 per cent of our foreign shipping was carried in American bottoms. In practical effect our merchant marine has disappeared from the high seas. An American traveler in foreign ports will almost look in vain for a mast carrying the Stars and Stripes. This is not only a humiliation to our national pride but it is an annual drain of some $250,000,000 on our American enterprise paid to foreign shipowners; and, in addition, the existing condition places our American farmers, merchants, bankers, manufacturers, and other shippers at the mercy of their foreign business rivals by having to charter their ships under such terms and conditions and at such times and places as their foreign rivals may dictate.

It is an alarming and lamentable condition to contemplate that, with our population of nearly 100,000,000 people—the most progressive, capable, industrious, and ambitious on the earth—producing annually some $10,000,000,000 in value of agricultural products and some $21,000,000,000 in value of manufactured products, with our population increasing rapidly and our lands being rapidly settled and developed, and, consequently, with our necessity constantly becoming more urgent speedily and economically to reach all the countries and population of the globe in the sale and exchange of our enormous surplus annual output, while they are now providing one-eighth of the total foreign commerce of the world, yet they carry only one-tenth of that one-eighth—that is, 1¼ per cent of the world's commerce—in American ships; and the amount of cash paid to foreign shipowners for carrying our foreign commerce exceeds $250,000,000 per year in normal times.

Evidently and certainly something, either in law or in economic conditions, is fundamentally and radically wrong, because this condition should not obtain. The major portion of the difference between American exports and American imports each year is paid by the American people to owners of foreign ships to carry on that import and export trade in normal times; and thus, instead of our people saving that $250,000,000 per year, they are paying it for the labor, capital, and ships of foreigners when the American people might better thus employ their own capital and labor, build up their own merchant marine, and save that enormous average annual drain of $250,000,000.

Solidly upon the Republican side of this House, and in considerable numbers upon the Democratic side, the contention is made with zeal and earnest insistence that American private capital can and will supply an adequate American merchant marine.

It is always a difficult matter to determine what activities the Federal Government should undertake. Personally I do not believe the Government should go into those quasi public enterprises in which private persons and capital can and will engage to a sufficient extent to provide adequate facilities. I magnify the individual rather than the Government. That conviction is intensified by my observations and experiences in public life, where I have noted the vast political power and insistent demands of the multitudes of Government employees now in service in many different departments. Besides, in a Republic it is of first importance to recognize and to encourage individual initiative and enterprise. But it is surely a sound rule to observe, in the preservation and development of this mighty and growing Republic, that where the safety, health, development, prosperity, and happiness of the masses imperatively demand that any public or quasi public facility be provided, if private persons with private capital either can not or will not provide it on terms that are fair and just to the public and on a scale commensurate with the legitimate public needs, the Federal Government itself should provide such facilities. This same principle applies with American cities involving their water, their lighting, their power, and other systems as with the Nation which has sanely applied it to the extent of hundreds of millions of dollars spent upon its rivers and lakes for domestic commerce, its many harbors, the Panama Canal—which has cost the Government $400,000,000—and its many other fields of public endeavor.

I say with entire conviction that if private capital would and could build and operate an adequate American merchant marine there would be neither necessity nor desire that the United States embark upon that enterprise at all. But it is clearly evident that American capital either can not or will not provide a merchant marine adequate to the requirements of our foreign commerce. While some $600,000,000 is invested by American private capital in American ships, representing some 3,100 ships in all, still of the number only 361 ships, valued at $69,000,000, owned by American persons, firms, and corporations, are engaged in deep-sea shipping, and they carry only from 5 per cent to 8 per cent of our foreign commerce. That is proof conclusive that if the American people are to have an adequate merchant marine they can not depend upon private capital to supply it; certainly not under existing laws. And yet, both as auxiliaries for the American Navy as transports, supply and hospital ships, colliers, and scout cruisers in times of war, and as carriers for American commerce in times of peace, it is indispensable that an American merchant marine be provided if our naval defense is ever to be made secure, if American industry is ever again to be free from the toll of $250,000,000 annually to foreign shipowners in normal times and double or treble that sum in war times, as now obtain, and if ever again the American flag is to fly in foreign ports upon the mastheads of American merchantmen as a symbol of untrammeled American commerce.

Many different devices have been suggested, and many have been proposed from time to time in the Congress, to extend or revive our merchant marine. It is undisputed that it costs from 50 per cent to 60 per cent more to build merchant ships in the United States than in foreign shipyards. This is in part because of our duties under our tariff laws laid on the many different articles entering into ship construction, in part because of the high scale of American wages, in part because of the more elaborate finish of American boats, in part because no American shipyard has yet adopted, as has long since been done in British and other foreign shipyards, a uniformity of model or design, and probably in part because we have developed a less efficient working system because of less work and training in constant shipbuilding as in certain foreign countries, where the pursuits of the sea are a national necessity, habit, and passion. And it is undisputed that it costs from 25 per cent to 35 per cent more to operate an American-owned ship than it does a foreign-owned ship on account of our laws and our labor conditions.

But all of the discussions and all of the proposals have come to naught during the past 50 years. Effort has been made to remove the tariff duty on the different materials out of which merchant ships are built. Admission of foreign-built vessels to American registry has been advocated. The Congress has many times in the past considered changing in various ways our navigation laws, and as continuously failed to accomplish that end. Effort has been made to subsidize American shipping, and thus to put a burden on the American people of an amount sufficient to equalize the difference between the cost of manufacture and operation of American ships as against those made and sailed under foreign flags; but all such efforts have likewise failed. It is perfectly certain that the Democratic Party will remain true to its ancient principles to oppose subsidy in any form; and when the Republican Party was in power for 16 years, from 1896 to 1912, it was never able to change the national laws so as to grant either direct or indirect subsidy to American shipping and thus to attempt to equalize the difference between the cost of construction and operation of American and foreign ships.

It ought to be evident to all of us that at present, as in the past, the navigation laws can not be changed, because the labor unions of the country resist that change upon the ground that any such change would involve the lowering of the standard of American wages, and Congress will continue to heed, as in the past it has heeded, that insistent view.

This is not a time—this awful national and international crisis through which we are passing—for anything but plain words, spoken with candor although with fraternal kindness; and therefore I assert unequivocally that American private capital is not to be condemned in its initiative and in its courageous aspirations when it declines to go extensively into the business of constructing American ships which cost from 50 to 60 per cent more than similar ships constructed in foreign shipyards, nor for not extensively operating in the foreign trade American ships which cost from 25 to 35 per cent more to operate than it costs to operate similar ships on the same passage under a foreign flag. But, while thus exonerating American private capital from the blame for having failed to provide an adequate merchant marine, it is idle longer to continue to act upon the theory that private capital can or will under existing laws and under existing cost items provide that indispensable facility to American commerce.

I have stated that normal American commerce pays foreign bottoms $250,000,000 per annum for its service, but that is not the only disquieting factor involved in our situation. At the present time, and for the past six months when the great nations of Europe have been in war, in part because they have taken out of the avenue of foreign commerce vast numbers of merchantmen to use as transports for troops, in part to place exclusively in their own service to supply their own people in these times of stress, and in part because interned in American and other ports, vast numbers of foreign ships commonly employed in our carrying trade are denied to us, causing great congestion of shipping at our ports, with the result of poor prices for our products of the farms, mines, ranches, and manufactories. This illustrates the utter folly and weakness of our reliance upon foreign bottoms. And one of the evidences of human frailty—to take advantage of misfortune in others in order to reap profit—is shown in the fact that foreign and American shipowners alike have availed of American necessities to extort enormous additional tolls from American commerce. It has been conclusively demonstrated that we can not depend either upon foreign bottoms as a sure source of our supply, or upon either foreign or American bottoms to give at all times an adequate service for a fair compensation. The following facts, indicated by the report of the actuary of the Treasury Department, are highly illuminating: Taking July, 1914, when the world was at peace, and using the month of January, 1915, as a comparison, when the world was in the midst of international war conditions, it will be found that from the port of New York the cost of shipping grain to Liverpool has increased 300 per cent and to Rotterdam 900 per cent; flour, 300 to 500 per cent; meat products, from 50 to 150 per cent; and cotton, from 400 to 700 per cent. From Philadelphia and Baltimore the cost of transporting all of these products has risen in about the same proportion. From Galveston the cost of shipping grain to Liverpool has increased during January, 1915, over July, 1914, 174 per cent, while the cost of shipping cotton from the port of Galveston to Liverpool has increased 361 per cent; to Genoa, 420 per cent; and to Bremen, from $1.40 to $17.50 per bale of 500 pounds weight, or 1,150 per cent.

These rates are so enormous that for the year 1915, in addition to the ordinary $250,000,000 to be paid to foreign bottoms by American commerce, an additional amount of $311,000,000 will be extorted from the American people. If present conditions continue during the year, as to the volume of our exports and as to the rate of charges obtaining for their transportation, it will mean something like $560,000,000 of American money to be paid to transport American products—nearly all of it going to foreign shipowners. It is a condition that is appalling to any man who is a patriot and as such has the industrial freedom and the economic independence, as well as the political welfare, of the American people at heart. While no one would contend that all of that added burden of extortionate freight tolls will fall upon the American producer, still it is entirely certain that the American producer must of necessity receive very much less for his products than he otherwise would receive but for these excessive tolls.

Since, then, it is certain that American private capital has not gone into the business of constructing and operating an adequate American merchant marine, and since it is so inadequate that it accommodates only 5 to 8 per cent of American deep-sea shipping, and since it is evident that it is not possible presently or in the early future either so to change our American registry or navigation or other shipping laws as to make possible the building by private capital and their operation of an adequate merchant marine, and since the exigencies of this European war have clearly demonstrated that even our American-owned ships are quite as greedy and extortionate and quite as anxious to take advantage of the helpless condition of our foreign commerce as even their foreign rivals, it appears to me to be a plain duty of the statesmanship of this hour to devise a means to free our people from foreign shipping domination and their industry from the great toll annually paid to foreign bottoms in normal times and the exactions of unbridled greed in these present times.

We have devised and now tender to the Congress the bill now under consideration which we are confident will accomplish that legitimate purpose. The $40,000,000 it provides for the establishment, either by construction or purchase or both, of an American merchant marine to be used as auxiliary of our Navy in time of war and as transport of our foreign merchandise in time of peace, while a large amount is yet insignificant measured by the results which it would achieve of benefit to the American people. Indeed, it would be returned to the American people seven or eight times over this present year 1915 in the item alone of the excess charges they will pay to the shipping monopoly over the amount they would have paid for the same service this present year but for the war emergency that has arisen.

Gentlemen here have urged that it is futile to pass this bill at the present session of Congress, because a large part of American agricultural products and manufactures have already moved abroad, and that possibly the European war may end before ships could be purchased or constructed under this bill to accommodate American commerce. But I call their attention to the fact that if the war in Europe should end this day it would take at least another year for international shipping conditions again to become normal, and that during that time our people will have raised another $10,000,000,000 crop, a large part of which must be exported, and will have manufactured probably $20,000,000,000 worth of products, a large portion of which must also be exported, and therefore that congestion in shipping, rather than a proper accommodation of shipping, even in the event the European war should soon end, will probably result. It is of equal or greater importance that the surplus wheat and corn of the Northwest, the cotton of the South, the cattle of the mighty farming regions of our country, the enormous bulk of other American products, and the vast volume of American manufactures to be produced during this year, and most of which will actually be ready for export within the next six to nine months, may be exported when produced and ready than the export of the balance of the existing crop of products and store of merchandise.

The financial chaos and the crash of our entire industrial system which would inevitably follow from the breakdown of even the existing system of employing foreign bottoms to carry American exports and imports, unless some adequate system be provided in its stead, are incalculable and incomprehensible. In practical effect it is no less than the demoralization, if not the destruction, of our proud national position and our civilization itself. In the face of such a recognized possible national calamity petty views of opinion, or even serious differences as to principles of government, should not have determining weight with us who are charged with authority and duty in this national and international crisis.

I am not one who believes that this shipping enterprise should be made a mere temporary or emergency measure; for, independently of the existence of the European war, which has emphasized our practically total dependence on foreign bottoms for the transport of American exports and imports, the fact would still obtain that there is no considerable American merchant marine, although private capital has been invited to occupy that avenue of investment and enterprise ever since this Government was established and notwithstanding the Government itself has never undertaken that work. But this war has emphasized the fact that in such a crisis our people are powerless in their dependence even upon foreign bottoms for a sure supply, although both foreign and American bottoms have extorted from threefold to eightfold the tolls they have charged American commerce in normal times. I am not willing, as a Representative, that the American people shall thus continue wholly dependent in this important matter of their foreign shipping, which involves their national prosperity to so great an extent, upon the merchant ships of their commercial rivals or upon the greed and caprice of either private-owned American or foreign ships. In effect their present condition robs our farmers of the fruits of their toil, hampers the legitimate growth of American agriculture, stock raising, mining, manufacturing and other industries, cripples the pride of all of our people, hinders the normal expansion of their commercial activities, extorts undue tolls from their industry, renders them dependent upon the grace of their foreign rivals, places them subject to the greed and caprice of the shipping monopoly, strips American labor, capital, and industry of an enormous proportion of their annual earnings, and fetters the free and daring spirit of American initiative, enterprise, and industrial ambition; and such condition will continue to exist until the people themselves, through their Government, establish their own merchant marine.

I am confident that the American people will never consent, once the Government shall establish a merchant marine, that it discontinue that function and thus again make them subject to the interests and the greed of the American and foreign shipping monopoly. Besides, if it is now enacted that this measure must be temporary, its life expiring with any stated interval or emergency, both American and foreign shipping will understand definitely the extent of this Government's rivalry and can shape their selfish conduct at the expense of our people accordingly. Furthermore, it is not certain whether the shipping board provided by this act may find it best to construct or to purchase merchant ships under the provisions of this bill. This measure should not be a temporary palliative, but a permanent and heavy bludgeon in the hands of the American people with which to strike monopoly on the head. It should also be recognized that sailors are not made in a day and shipbuilders are not made in a day. Both require time and experience in order to acquire skill and efficiency. American shipyards can not hope to maintain efficiency to compete with foreign shipyards merely by the construction of an occasional battleship, and therefore our Nation must remain without skilled shipbuilding artisans unless some permanent policy be pursued making an avenue for the training of American skilled artisans and sailors. This fact looms very large in view of the enormous Navy we have built, on which some $1,600,000,000 have been expended since the year 1901, but which is even now, in the face of national peril, wholly without an adequate accompanying supply of auxiliaries such as this bill would provide in time of war. To my mind it is conclusive that a permanent policy which this bill should inaugurate will produce shipyards and docks and piers and artisans and sailors requisite to our naval and merchant marine uses, whereas a temporary policy in the nature of an emergency measure can not accomplish these desired results.

But, above these conditions perhaps, arises in my mind the still higher conception of the duty of statesmanship to the American people—that of providing for them in their collective capacity an indispensably necessary permanent means of enabling them to exchange their surplus products with the nations and peoples of the whole world upon ocean-freight terms that are fair and are not, as at present, largely confiscatory.

I would see our people free and unfettered in the conduct of their vast foreign commerce, as I would see them free and unfettered in all other respects involving their freedom, prosperity, and happiness.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think it is time to wake up the sleeping Democrats, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seventy-one Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this call 302 Members—a quorum—answered to their names.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri moves that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR].

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, I am going to vote for this bill because I have studied it and believe it is a thoroughly constitutional and a thoroughly Democratic measure. I am going to support it because my district, almost unanimously, is for this bill. Every newspaper, daily and weekly, published in my district is for the bill, and every public organization in the city in which I live—the Cotton Exchange, the Merchants' Exchange, the Business Men's Club, the Lumber Exchange, and every other business organization, I believe—is committed to it. Two great staples from my part of the country are vitally interested in it—cotton and lumber. It is an emergency measure for those two products especially, and various other products, and we are suffering greatly because of a lack of shipping facilities and because of extortionate rates, and I believe we ought to pass this bill to remedy the trouble.

There is another reason why I am in favor of it—and I want to say to my Democratic colleagues and my Republican colleagues that I am not ashamed to say it, but am proud to say it—and it is because a great Democratic President, the leader of his party and the leader of his country, is in favor of this bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, I intended to say something which I have already prepared about other features of this bill and of this debate, but my attention is going to be diverted for the short time I have to some of the remarks of the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY]. The gentleman from Washington has never been able to see anything good in President Wilson. He is the most prejudiced man on this subject I ever saw. Nine or ten months ago no man ever so bitterly attacked another as the gentleman from Washington attacked the President of the United States on the floor of this House because he would not go to war with Mexico. Daily, almost, he abused him along this line and exhausted the vocabulary in his harsh and unjust and prejudiced criticism, and yet to-day we hear the gentleman from Washington coming before us as a disciple of peace, afraid to give this power to the President, afraid to give this power to the administration, because, says the gentleman from Washington, he is afraid that the President will involve our country in war. Ah, Mr. Speaker, that is not what is the matter with the gentleman from Washington. Last spring, when he was decrying against the President about not warring on Mexico, we found the Oil Trust and the Fruit Trust and the Steel Trust and the Sugar Trust desiring this Government to intervene in Mexico, and we found the gentleman from Washington and those who believe with him lining up with those trusts and against the President of the United States. What do we find here to-day? We find the gentleman from Washington lined up again with one of the greatest trusts that this country has ever known—the Shipping Trust. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In abusing the President of the United States it is the same old argument for the trusts. He was for the trusts last spring; he is for them again this winter. Now, it never seems to occur to the gentleman that his position about the matter is inconsistent. Consistency is waved aside when the gentleman attacks the President. Why, the gentleman from Washington is so prejudiced against Woodrow Wilson that I do not believe he would vote to indorse the Lord's Prayer if the President of the United States had indorsed it first. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from Washington has got a bad case of the shingles.

Mr. McKELLAR. The gentleman has got a bad case of the shingles, as my friend from Georgia here says. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Washington says something else. He says that there are no Democrats over here who are heartily in favor of this bill. Why, the gentleman is wholly in error and, as usual, does not know what he is talking about. He says the Democrats praise President Wilson on the floor and curse him in the cloakrooms. I deny it, and say it is untrue. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We do not do anything of the kind. I do not know how the gentleman got into a Democratic cloakroom and found out what he claims to have found out.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I walked in.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the gentleman walked in, he did not hear what he claims to have heard. Now, I want to say this: Here is a bill——

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman walked into the wrong cloakroom.

Mr. McKELLAR. As my friend suggests, the gentleman perhaps walked into the wrong cloakroom, and if he heard somebody abuse the President, it was in the Republican cloakroom.

Now, I want to say this about this matter: It is claimed that this bill has not been considered by this House. This is not true. This measure has been reported out by a committee of this House and has been considered by a committee of this House. It is in line with what the great majority of Democrats believe, is a mandate of the Democratic platform at Baltimore. It has been the policy of the Democratic Party at all times to build up and foster a merchant marine. The President of the United States is not trying to jam anything down our throats. We are working with him. He is doing just exactly what we want in urging us to pass this bill and in helping us pass it. We want a ship bill, and we want to build up the American merchant marine which you gentlemen have allowed to be destroyed by your policies during the last 50 years. We want to build it up, and the President of the United States is simply standing solidly and earnestly and vigorously with the Democratic Party in endeavoring to carry out our platform on that subject, and we respect him and admire him for his position. He is not afraid. He is not to be deterred by the obstacles which you may try to throw in the way. He is standing squarely for the Democratic Party and for the urgent needs of the country, and this House will stand with him.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman said this bill has been reported by a committee. It does not so show on its face. It says it was referred to a committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, the gentleman knows perfectly well, if he knows anything about what has happened in this House, that the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries have reported out exactly this kind of a bill. Indeed, this very bill in substance.

Mr. PLATT. But not this bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; this bill. On September 8. Of course, this is an amendment to a bill; it is different only in a parliamentary sense or a technical sense, but the very bill, substantially word for word, almost letter for letter, has been considered by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries of this House and reported to this House some time ago. The Senate committee has also substantially reported it. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee). The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PLATT. This rule says the committee is discharged from the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KENT.]

Mr. KENT. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] has challenged those of us who disagree with the proposed measure to suggest amendments. I shall suggest two, which I believe to be fundamentally necessary if we are not to blunder into war.

These under the rule will, of course, die unconsidered, and so I shall be constrained to vote against the bill.

First. The purchase of belligerent ships should be precluded; and Second. Federal merchant ships should not carry cargoes to belligerent nations, but should confine their services to neutral commerce and to our home and coastwise ports.

Under different conditions I should most heartily support this bill. I not only believe that it is proper and advisable for the Federal Government to go into the shipping business, but I believe that it is especially necessary in view of the needs of the Navy. Even if we, the whole people, shall operate such ships at a loss, it is better to subsidize all of us than pay a few beneficiaries under a system of private subsidies.

We all know that we are short of auxiliary vessels for the Navy, and short of men of the right sort to man our Navy in time of war. But the world has been stricken with madness, and those who circulate in the neighborhood of the rabid can not be too careful lest they be inoculated.

When we consider the argument urged by every one of the nations at war, that each is struggling for national existence, and then total up the sum of the strife, we find that they are all valiantly struggling for national destruction and damnation—in which we desire no part.

As a Nation seeking peace, as a Nation sympathizing with the trials and struggles and the sufferings of all, it is our business to keep ourselves from even the appearance of evil.

I, for one, do not distrust the President or his Cabinet. I believe that they are acting from the highest motives and from the best light they have. But that can not in any way relieve us of the Congress from our personal responsibility. [Applause on the Republican side.] It rests with Congress to determine whether or not we shall be embroiled. It is no less incumbent upon us to prevent the first step than it is to prevent the last step into war. Each and every Member of this House has a personal duty to keep the country at peace, and each should voice that responsibility free from partisanship, conscientiously.

We are told that the bill before us is drawn along lines of international law. I have read with the greatest care the masterly utterances of authorities who differ entirely as to what constitutes international law in connection with shipping.

It is admitted that the international law as construed by different nations is at variance.

We know that international law is nothing but convention established from time to time between the nations or made to order by those most powerful on land or sea as suits their convenience. It is absurd that international law should, for instance, countenance the sale of munitions of war by the individuals of a neutral country and at the same time should consider it a violation of international law for a nation to sell such munitions of war from its own stores. The first proposition condones a crime against humanity, the latter is a feeble minimizing of an evil privilege. If only all munitions of war were manufactured by governments, international law would save all of us from the iniquity of promoting murder among friendly nations.

We are familiar with Lowell's poem, Jonathan to John, wherein John Bull is berated for selling arms to the Confederacy:

> You wonder why we're hot, John?
> Your mark wuz on the guns,
> The neutral guns, that shot, John,
> Our brothers an' our sons.
> * * * * *

I prefer to consider questions like the one before us from the standpoint of private judgment, unbiased by all these diametrically opposed and conflicting definitions. For as long as the dictionaries of international law can be published in constantly changing editions, by all nations, and when doctors of international law so violently disagree, each citizen must make his own determination, based on his judgment of what ought to be law—ought to be law, because law is supposed to be common sense.

In the bill before us we find that "no purchases shall be made in a way which shall disturb the conditions of neutrality."

If this proviso means anything, it simply means that we shall not purchase interned ships in a manner productive of discussion or trouble. This is a small meaning. If the sentence should read "no purchase shall be made or operations undertaken that shall disturb the conditions of neutrality," there would be real meaning in this proviso. To my mind, it would be far better to declare against the "purchase of any ship that is entitled to fly the flag of any nation now at war."

The ships now interned in the neutral waters of the United States would be subject to capture if they went out under their own flags. If they were to go out under our flag, there would be a close analogy to the case where a hound dog chased a rabbit into a hole and waited at the mouth of the hole, saying to himself with watering mouth, "There is my rabbit," and thereafter the rabbit emerged with an American flag wrapped around him. There might be trouble for the rabbit and the American flag might be torn. It is safer to leave belligerent ships entirely alone. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The next question is as to what the Federally owned ships shall do after they are built or purchased. The bill specifically provides that they shall engage in foreign commerce and shall not hamper or compete with the coastwise trade. Now, whatever international law may be, we, all of us in this House, have had some experience with practical politics, and we know the vast difference that would be held by our citizens to obtain between the seizure of a privately owned ship that might be guilty of carrying contraband—and contraband varies with every nation and from day to day—at its own risk, and a Federal ship that might be seized for the same reason.

There is a vast political difference between privately owned and public-owned ships. The private shipowner may take his chances without involving the country in war, but the public ship, under Federal ownership and control, if doing what the private ship might do with nothing but the penalty of capture, would, to my mind, be extremely apt to drag us into this contest wherein the warring nations are all too willing to involve all their neighbors.

The thin disguise that a private corporation shall manage these ships and that by such fiction the Government shall secure immunity seems puerile in this day and generation. There is a continual effort born of necessity to hold those who control the management of corporations to full personal responsibility. Else why should the Rockefellers be prosecuted and persecuted for the iniquities of the war in Colorado?

Our Federal vessels should be confined to traffic with neutral countries and should engage in our own coastwise trade. They would then release coastwise vessels for foreign trade. It is absurd to contend that vessels belonging to all the people should be hampered by coastwise laws, while those belonging to privileged corporations, a few of the people and perhaps none of them our own people, shall have open to them the full privileges of our home trade. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. How much time did the gentleman use?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Seven minutes. The gentleman yields back 3 minutes.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I am of the opinion that there is very little difference between Member and Member as to whether we should have a merchant marine or not.

On the other hand, I think that everybody here is agreed that the Nation ought to have a merchant marine and that instead of allowing foreign countries to carry our merchandise we ought to provide the means by which we can carry a portion of it, at least, ourselves. This bill, however, professes to be one suggestion of the manner of building up the merchant marine that I do not believe will be a success, first, because it is admitted by its sponsors to be an emergency bill, and its very character as such is that two years after the war closes the Government is to discontinue the use of the ships as a carrying or merchant agency, when they are to be taken back to the Navy Department. The Navy is permitted to sublet or to lease to merchantmen. In this way the Government builds at its own cost the ship and leases it to other corporations. I do not believe that that is a wise method. In the first place, the Government, taking all the risk in an enterprise which thus far has not proved a success financially, not only in expenditure but also in the possible contingencies that might arise with other countries through our Government owning the vessels and operating them through some sublessees, you are thus inviting complications instead of avoiding the dangers that I see in this particular plan of Government ownership. Then, again, I am not ready to change our methods and abandon private ownership for governmental ownership. I do not believe that the time is here when I am justified in taking such a long step toward national socialism as that step would be. On the other hand, I am convinced that the Government ought to encourage private enterprise and not to discourage it. I do not think the Government ought to enter into competition with private enterprise, because private enterprise certainly can not successfully compete against the Government. And instead of driving out of existence private enterprise by the strong arm of the Government, the Government ought to stimulate it. Then, again, I am opposed to the manner in which this bill has come into the House.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present. I think the gentleman is entitled to an audience here.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and fifty-five gentlemen are present—not a quorum.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee). On this call 276 Members have responded, a quorum.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] is recognized for six minutes more.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, at 11 o'clock to-day we went into session. It is now 6 o'clock. We have spent 7 hours here. During that time we have had five roll calls on the question of no quorum and two roll calls on other phases of the parliamentary status and have 3 hours and 50 minutes left out of the 6 hours of general debate originally allotted. I mention that to indicate that the majority side is not interested in this legislation.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. FESS. I will.

Mr. ADAMSON. You would not have had the last roll call if the gentleman himself had not yielded the floor for that purpose.

Mr. FESS. I had to yield the floor under parliamentary law and the rules of the House.

Mr. ADAMSON. Was there any compulsion on the gentleman?

Mr. FESS. Yes. I was compelled on the point of order, and I had no recourse.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not agree with the gentleman on that.

Mr. FESS. The point of no quorum takes me off the floor.

Mr. Speaker, I want to repeat that the Democratic side of this House is not interested in this legislation. There is not any question about it. You are not in favor of it, and you are here, when you are here, simply to ratify an order that has come in from the White House. Otherwise you would stay here and not kill time in this way.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. FESS. I do.

Mr. RAINEY. Does it not indicate that the House is not interested in the gentleman's speech?

Mr. FESS. Oh, that is a cheap thing for you to say. I am not the only one who is speaking from this floor. The gentleman himself will be speaking later, perhaps, and if he should speak I will have the respect to stay and listen to him if he has anything to say. [Applause.] There have been as many speeches on the Democratic side of the House as from the Republican side. But the fact is you are taking your orders from the White House, and you know you are. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The Senate on the 15th day of last month began the discussion of this issue. It is still before that body. It is now by order brought over here. You listen to the order that comes from the White House and bring in a rule to close this debate here in six hours. Then you refuse to stay in the Chamber that the hours may be consumed in debate without your presence. Less than five-sixths of one minute is permitted to each Member of this House to debate this issue. Forty-nine seconds are all that you are allotting to the individual Member of the House, and yet you are discussing an issue that involves an entire change of the governmental policy of the Nation, which is neither Democratic nor Republican, so far as an issue goes; an issue that ought to take months for its discussion before you undertake to make the change. And more than that, you are undertaking to do a thing that may involve the Nation not only in national industrial disturbance but in international trouble. Every single time that a Government-owned vessel flying the American flag crosses the sea in time of war our Nation will be taking the risk of getting into trouble by violating the laws of neutrality. Suppose such a vessel were seized by a foreign country, what would be the consequence? And yet, with but five-sixths of one minute allotted to the individual Member to discuss this great issue, involving national and international complications, you refuse to remain here to make a quorum, because it is all done, anyway, by Executive order. There is not a Member in this House, Republican or Democrat, that does not know that the order is given, and it will be carried out just as it is given.

It seems to me that this House of Representatives, with 435 Members, is in a peculiar situation, if its membership will receive orders from the White House to ratify simply what the occupant of the White House says. That is precisely the situation here. You condemn it privately, but you do not dare to do it publicly. I do not blame you for not doing it publicly. But there is not a Member on this side of the House, as there is not on that side, but knows that we ought not to push a measure like this through this House in six hours with scarcely any discussion at all, and when men on the floor are asking to be heard in the debate, you do not even have interest to stay here to listen, and the excuse is given that the men who speak have not anything to say that is worth hearing. That may be your standard of legislation, but I want to say to you that it is rather the measure of Executive influence over this House. It is also the measure of the weakness of the American Congress.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. FESS. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I want to say that I have not been directed by the White House or anybody else to support this bill. I am going to support this bill without any direction from anybody.

Mr. FESS. I am glad to hear it. The gentleman has shown his independence on other occasions.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I do not believe anybody on this side has had instructions from anybody to vote for this bill. I think the gentleman from Ohio makes a misstatement when he says that this side has been directed to vote for this bill.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I yielded to the gentleman because I wanted to be courteous to him. But that does not change the situation after all. I said a moment ago that it was not the measure of the strength of the executive department, but it is the measure of the weakness of the legislative department; and I repeat that statement. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The time has come when the legislative body ought to speak on matters of legislation, and not have orders sent down to put a thing through and rush it without further debate than six hours. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] will permit, I would like to yield a little time which I have reserved. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, the discourse to which we have just listened from the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], which might be more appropriately termed a scolding than an address, is, of course, very interesting. We have heard here to-day, and we hear frequently on the part of Members of the opposition, the fact that men on this side have not sufficient courage to vote their own convictions because they are dictated to from the White House. So far as I am individually concerned, I deny that charge, and on behalf of my Democratic friends I deny it for them. I say for myself that if this proposition were put up to the American Congress by a Republican administration, by a Republican President, believing in it as I do as a safe measure, I would have what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] does not possess—patriotism and courage enough to vote for it, regardless of where it comes from. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

During the progress of this debate I have heard much from gentlemen who oppose the bill about embarking this Government in Government ownership and "State socialism." If this sophistry affords them a convenient argument against coming to the relief of the people in this great emergency, I shall be the last to rob them of the effect of its soothing qualities.

However, I desire to call attention to a serious condition which confronts the people of this Nation, and which may grow more serious as this great war progresses. I am not frightened, Mr. Speaker, by the specter of "Government ownership," which has been raised to becloud the issue in this contest. I do not propose on this occasion to be beguiled into a desertion of my plain duty by following or adopting old worn-out political aphorisms, which were perhaps applicable to another generation and to other conditions, but which have no place and no value in the solution of this and many other modern questions with which we have to deal.

Let us face conditions as they are now, and not rattle around among the dead bones of ancient heroes while our people suffer and are robbed. The greatest war in history is now in progress. The avenues of trade and the means of transportation upon the high seas have been interrupted. Freight rates upon the ocean have been increased from 300 to 1,100 per cent, and upon many commodities the rates are absolutely prohibitive, even if ships could be secured. We are at the mercy of a foreign Shipping Trust. There can be no question about that. Less than 8 per cent of our foreign commerce is carried by ships flying the American flag. The balance is carried by foreign ships. This foreign shipping monopoly has increased the freight rates upon American cotton from $1.25 per bale to $15 and $18 per bale. It has increased the rate for the shipment of lumber to such an extent that no man can afford to ship it at all, and many of our lumber mills have been compelled to close down and throw men out of employment because they can not secure ships to carry lumber; and if they could, the rates are so high as to make shipment at a profit out of the question.

This foreign shipping monopoly has increased the freight rate on Kentucky export tobacco from 30 cents per hundred pounds to $3.40 and $4 per hundred pounds, and ships are so scarce and rates so high that many foreign buyers have cabled their agents in this country to stop buying. These foreign shipowners have canceled contracts with American shippers running for a year without notice, and have compelled them to pay outrageous increases in freight or let their products rot upon the shores. They have arbitrarily refused to carry some commodities in order to have more room for others upon which they could charge higher rates.

Mr. Speaker, this condition of affairs has been especially hurtful to the farmers of Kentucky. Our great money crop, especially in the western part of the State, is dark tobacco, 85 per cent of which is exported to Europe. The prices which have been received by the farmers for that product in the last few years have ranged around $8 and $10 per hundred for the best grades, with smaller prices for lower grades. It was expected that the European war would to some extent affect the price of tobacco to the farmer, and this expectation has been fearfully fulfilled. But when it is contemplated that in addition to this unfavorable market condition a foreign shipping monopoly, flying other flags than ours, has arbitrarily raised the freight upon that tobacco from 30 cents per hundred to $3.40 per hundred, which increase must in the long run come largely from the farmer's pocket because of the decrease in the price which he may receive, some idea may be obtained of the unhappy conditions which must prevail if that condition is permitted to continue.

These same conditions prevail, with varying degrees, with respect to everything the American people have to ship. The American people have a surplus every year of both farm products and manufactured products. That surplus they have a right to sell in the markets of the world wherever it is needed to administer to the wants of humanity. In this great crisis a great emergency calls for action. The markets of the world yearn for our surplus products. Shall we sit with folded hands and complacent consciences and say this great Government has no remedy to offer to her people? [Applause.]

It is not surprising that the Republican Members of Congress are against this measure. They do not want prosperity to come to the people. They would rather see the whole country in want than for this Democratic administration or the Democratic Party to get any credit for relieving a distressing situation. They would rather see the whole country on its way to perdition in a hand basket than to see tranquillity, peace, and prosperity under a Democratic administration. For 50 years they had an opportunity to build up an American merchant marine under the Constitution. Did they do it? Did they attempt it? Only by proposing to take the money of the people collected in taxes and give it graciously to a shipping trust in the form of a subsidy. In the opinion of these Republicans it is a crime, if not treason itself, to take the people's money and buy some ships to be operated by the people's Government for their relief in a great emergency; but it is the quadrupled quintescence of Republican statesmanship to take that same money and give it to a shipping trust for its private benefit without return to the Government. [Applause.]

We have heard the great constitutional and international lawyer and world-renowned diplomat from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] discuss this question from the standpoint of constitutional and international law. [Laughter.]

We need not stop now to discuss the constitutional questions involved in this measure. Under the Constitution this Nation has spent its money to improve rivers and harbors in order that the commerce of America might move. Does that same instrument deny us the right also to spend some of our money to make those rivers aud harbors available and valuable in a great emergency such as that which confronts us now? Under the Constitution we have spent our money to reclaim the arid lands of the West in order to make more homes for farmers. Does that instrument deny us the right to purchase ships in a great emergency in order that this farmer may find a market for his produce? Under the Constitution we have spent our money to make the soil more fertile in every State and to make two blades of grass grow instead of one. Does that instrument deny us the right to afford to the farmers of the Nation in a great emergency reasonable facilities for transporting that surplus produce to the markets of the world? Under the Constitution we have sent consuls and American agents to all the civilized nations of the world to build up and foster American trade in those countries. Shall that instrument be now invoked against our effort to provide at least temporary facilities for the transportation of the commerce thus secured? Under the Constitution we have established the parcel post for the cheap transportation of products upon land; we have regulated the rates that may be charged by railroads and other common carriers upon the land; and under the Constitution we have done a vast number of things that the Government could do for the benefit of all the people that could or would not have been done by private enterprises.

Mr. Speaker, if the rates for hauling freight over the railroads of the United States had been in the last six months raised in the same proportion as they have upon the high seas, the American people would rise up without exception and demand that their Government come to their relief. It so happens that we can regulate and control, and have regulated and controlled, the rates at which our products may be hauled upon the land. But we have no such power to control the rates charged upon the high seas, because most of the ships are foreign and our jurisdiction only extends three miles from shore. Consequently, the only remedy that is left to us in this emergency, which will grow greater as this great war continues, is to pass this bill and let the Government purchase and operate these vessels for the benefit of all the people, farmers, manufacturers, and merchants alike, and after the war is over and the emergency is passed we shall have more time to discuss intelligently and dispassionately the permanent policy which we shall adopt in the future in order to build up a strong and permanent American merchant marine. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

For the present the town is on fire, and it does not behoove us as intelligent men to stand under a sycamore tree and discuss the question whether it would be wise at some time in the future to put in waterworks and a fire department, while all the time the town is burning. Let us grab the buckets, go to the nearest and most available source of water, and put out the fire. The settlement of future policies and programs can well await the day when the rebuilding shall begin. [Applause.]

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] use some of his time?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TEMPLE].

Mr. TEMPLE. Mr. Speaker, several times this afternoon I have noticed the use of a phrase like the one used by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] who just took his seat, referring to the preservation of the neutrality of the United States. In section 7 of this bill we find as the concluding paragraph these words:

Provided further, That in making purchases of ships during the continuance of the present European war no purchases shall be made in a way which will disturb the conditions of neutrality.

It seems to me that neither the declarations made on the floor of the House that neutrality will not be disturbed nor the provision in this bill to the same effect touch the real point of international difficulty. It is conceivable, but not very likely, that in the purchase of ships owned by belligerents the transaction might in some way compromise the neutrality of the United States. For example, the question of neutrality might be raised concerning the shipment of money to pay for those vessels. Money is contraband, just as gunpowder is contraband; but, to my mind, this is not the point upon which an international dispute is most likely to arise. No declaration that the United States Government will preserve its neutrality touches the real danger of the bill. We could buy those ships, private persons could buy them, or perhaps even the Government itself could buy them, without raising any question of having committed an unneutral act. The real point is this: If the declaration of London is in force—and it is in force in English law—we buy ships that under British law, under French law, under German law, under Russian law, and under Italian law are subject to capture. It is not a question of the neutrality of the United States; it is a matter of buying property to which we can acquire only a clouded title.

The provision that forbids any purchase which would compromise the neutrality of the United States does not cover the case. We buy the property, but there is a doubt whether the owner could convey a clear title. The German owner of a ship lying idle in a harbor of the United States will remain the owner of it so long as it does not go outside of the 3-mile limit. When it sails the ocean as a German vessel any warship of an enemy of Germany has, under international law, the unquestioned right to capture it, merely because it is enemy property.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. I understand the gentleman states the proposition that a German-owned ship lying in American waters is the private property of that German, and that as long as it is in the waters of the United States, owned by him, he could sell that ship.

Mr. TEMPLE. I did not say that he had a right to sell it.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Does the gentleman say that the German citizen who owned a German ship lying in American waters could not sell that ship in good faith?

Mr. TEMPLE. If the gentleman will give me my time, I will make a speech on that subject. That is the topic that I am going to talk about. The question will not hold me any closer to the point than I would hold myself.

The whole question is whether the German owner of that ship can sell us property that will not be subject to capture. He can sell us all he owns, but if he sails it on the ocean it will be captured. If we buy it from him, we have to prove, in the language of the declaration of London, that it was not sold "in order to evade the consequences to which an enemy ship as such is exposed." If we can not prove this, the transfer of the vessel to the American flag is void.

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman allow me to interpose a question?

Mr. TEMPLE. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. I have seen it stated in some of the speeches in the Senate that the declaration of London has never been ratified by England, either by treaty or otherwise, and that the only law in force in England is a law that is 200 years old.

Mr. TEMPLE. I will answer the gentleman by saying that the declaration of London is in force in English courts. I exhibited here a week ago last Saturday an order in council and a royal proclamation, dated October 29, 1914, in which the King in council instructed all the judges of the prize courts to enforce the provisions of the declaration of London.

Mr. WEBB. Did not a commission report to——

Mr. TEMPLE. I can not yield longer nor go back further than the order in council. The point I make is that on October 29, 1914, an order in council was issued instructing the judges of the prize courts to put the London declaration into effect. The report to which you refer is of an earlier date than that, and no law earlier than that date can by any possibility supersede the later one.

Germany, Italy, France, and Russia have also put that law into effect. Now, when a case is tried, suppose a German ship is transferred to the American flag and captured by an English cruiser; it will be tried in an English court, not in an American court. If it is captured by a French cruiser, it will be tried in a French court.

A case arose in 1912 in which article 47 of the London declaration was involved, in a dispute between Italy and France during the late war between Italy and Turkey. Italy was enforcing the declaration of London, and France protested against it. They agreed to take the case to the court of arbitration at The Hague. The ruling of the court will be found in the report on the case of the Manouba, in the American Journal of International Law for July, 1913. The Hague Court of Arbitration gave its award in accordance with article 47 of the declaration of London, when neither Italy nor France had ratified that document. England has announced her intention to enforce it; we may protest. Italy had announced her intention to enforce it, and France had protested; and yet, when it went to the international court of arbitration at The Hague, that court sustained article 47 of the declaration of London. The powers that signed the declaration had agreed that the rules contained in it correspond, in substance, with the generally recognized principles of international law. I think we ought to avoid a controversy that is already practically decided against us. [Applause on the Republican side.] Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a request for unanimous consent. I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who may speak upon this bill may be permitted to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MADDEN, Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts, and several others objected.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee). The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order that no quorum is present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and forty-nine Members present, not a quorum.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 245 Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 75, noes 26.

So the motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, it is a trifle disconcerting to one who has a splendid speech to deliver to an expectant audience—or, at least, one that he hopes is expectant—to find while the roll is being called that the Members answer to their names and then immediately run as though they were trying to escape from the scene of their crimes. [Laughter.] I do not suppose, however, it is becoming in any of us to make complaint. By this time we ought to be used to any sort of treatment in the House. I think it is about all we deserve, and we may as well be satisfied, because I am sure it is all we are going to get. We have before us a bill that has never been considered by a committee of the House, that has never been passed upon by a committee of the House; one that is brought in here and one we are told to pass without the opportunity of considering it or of offering a single amendment to it. Not only that, but we have had added to it another measure, widely divergent in its subject matter and of transcendent importance to the American people. Both of these bills are of that importance, and yet we are, after a few hours of useless and almost absurd general debate, to vote upon them. You may pass this measure in this manner, if you like, but when you leave this Chamber, no matter what the hour may be, do not raise your heads in pride and say that you have this day labored in the greatest legislative body in the world. You have not labored in a legislative body at all. Do you know, my friends, that in every civilized nation in the world the legislative body of the people, the body that immediately represents the people, has been gaining in power at the expense of the other departments of the Government, save in our own?

The House of Commons has become the great ruling power of England; likewise the Chamber of Deputies in France, drawn from and immediately representing the people of France, is the great lawmaking, controlling body in that great country; likewise is this true in Italy, in Germany, aye, in Japan. But in the United States, where we claim free institutions were first given their real life, the people's body, the House of Representatives, has been rapidly declining in importance and in power until now its ancient glory is all but vanished. We have ceased to be an important factor in our scheme of government. The functions of this great branch, the lawmaking body designed to represent the will and protect the rights of the people, have been of late rapidly assumed by the Senate and the Executive. The House of Representatives as it stands to-day is an unnecessary and at times an inconvenient body—unnecessary because it has surrendered its power and performs no vital function, inconvenient because a slight obstacle that must be stepped on by the ever-growing Senate and Executive. This House is of about as much use to the Government of the United States to-day as the appendix is to the human frame, and no more. You are making history. You bring in a transcendently important matter of this kind and force its passage through this body, supposed directly to represent the people, without giving the people's representatives the slightest opportunity to shape it, frame it, or consider it. You make a farce, a complete farce, of this, the designed to be most important branch of the National Legislature.

You are making history. Yes; but history that you and your children and your children's children will be ashamed of during all the ages to come. You are reversing the processes fundamental in the evolution of free institutions and putting into action the forces that lead to absolutism.

But, Mr. Speaker, if I may have the attention of the brethren who are so terribly and deeply interested in this bill for just a moment, I would like to call the attention of the House to some of the things in the bill.

I wish I had time to call attention to many of the things, for it seems to me that the merits of the bill have not as yet attracted the attention of the Members of the House. Probably it is because we have not time to consider its merits or demerits, and for the further reason that it does not matter what the merits or defects are, anyway, for you are going to vote it through and make a wry face when you do the job. This bill is quite in harmony in its subject matter with the method of its presentation and passage. It is an inglorious surrender as a lawmaking body, representing the people of the United States, of some of the fundamental things intrusted to this body under our Government. This is the lawmaking part or at least a portion of the lawmaking part of our Government, and yet in two sections we propose to turn over to the Executive of the Nation the right to amend and repeal all the rules and regulations under the law that exist to-day for the control of our merchant marine, and to replace them with any other rules and regulations it may please his omnipotent power to import. No such power as that was ever given by a free people to a tyrant, except in the way you are giving this under the lash of the tyrant's whip.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I have only a moment.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I just want to puncture that error there.

Mr. MILLER. The gentleman can puncture later on in his own time, but he will find no error there.

Mr. ALEXANDER. If the gentleman were informed, he would not make such a statement.

Mr. MILLER. I have read the gentleman's bill, and I am giving it almost literally. The gentleman himself apparently does not know what is in the bill, and I do not wonder at it. I have not discovered anyone on that side of the House who pretends to understand what is in this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota declines to yield.

Mr. MILLER. One thing further. I notice in section 7 there is an apt and fitting expression of the attitude of this sycophantic, this cringing, this beseeching body of the people's representatives. It reads:

That the United States, through the shipping board and with the approval of the President, is authorized to purchase or construct vessels.

What a grand and glorious moment! The United States of America, whenever a grand and glorious President, clothed with his omnipotent power, graciously condescends to permit, these United States may purchase a ship! The United States can purchase a boat when the President of the United States says that it may. How does that comport with Democratic doctrine since the days of Thomas Jefferson?

Nay, more, Mr. Speaker; I observe some more things in this bill that attract the passing attention. We have not time to give any more than passing attention to the bill, but let us give that. I see that it provides that the corporation stock and the property of the corporation which it is proposed the corporation shall acquire shall be exempt from taxation. I suppose that is upon the theory that it is the property of the United States and ought not as such to be taxed. All well and good, so far as that goes, but the bill contemplates that private individuals will become subscribers to the capital stock of this $10,000,000 corporation up to 49 per cent, and if they do they will become the owners of almost half the property owned; and what right have you to absolve that property from paying its just share of taxes that are being paid to-day by all other property in America?

Then I notice one thing further. You say that while the United States, through its Executive and the board, is to control the corporation, because it is to have 51 per cent of the stock of the corporation, in the same breath you write into the bill a provision that a majority of the stockholders—not the stock, but a majority of the stockholders—can remove every officer of the corporation, and remove thereby the United States Government itself from the control of its own property. Then another thing. It is proposed to issue $40,000,000 worth of Panama Canal bonds to finance this project. What a gulp of American pride you swallow when you do this. In the days of our country's prosperity—Republican days; good, old Republican days—our country carried through the stupendous achievement of constructing this great aid to commerce and national defense, engineered it, and financed it almost entirely out of the current revenues of our prosperous country. Now that you have destroyed our country's prosperity, exhausted her Treasury, burdened her people with every conceivable form of taxation, you propose to reach back, lay violent hands upon the glory of the past, and rob former success to pay for this extravagant foolishness, to enter upon a career industrially vicious and fraught with grave danger to our national peace. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, how does the time stand between the two sides?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri has an hour and thirty-four minutes, the gentleman from Massachusetts has 1 hour and 24 minutes and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] has 20 minutes.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. I trust gentlemen on that side will use a little time.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, a short time ago when the question of tolls through the Panama Canal were up for consideration some of the Members of this House were ready and eager to repeat the story of the young American eagle when it lined its nest in the lion's mane, and now it seems that they are so afraid of England or of the thought of possible controversy that they are scared into conniption fits at the very flare of the lion's tail much less his mane. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The position they take reminds me a little bit, when gentlemen proceed to talk about the prospects of war, of the little story my father used to tell about a Georgia captain, and he had the right to talk about a Georgia captain because he was a Louisiana captain. He said during the war that there was a Georgia captain who had his troops along a certain defense, and he said to his troops, "Boys, there are only a few of us and our ammunition is short. We are hungry and tired. The Yankees have four companies and they have plenty of ammunition; they are well fed, and they are coming here presently. My orders to you are to fire three or four rounds and then run. I am a little lame and I will start now." [Applause.] That is the position these gentlemen take when we take this useless Weeks bill and put into it something that will do business. They say that the London convention has prohibited us from buying vessels. The fact of the matter is that such a prohibition has never been incorporated in any international agreement or convention in the history of this world. Never before has it been claimed with any color of authority that the American Government did not have a right to buy interned ships of a belligerent in a neutral port if we desired to do so, and never before has our procedure on that line been questioned.

England has taken our ships away from us; she has taken our merchant marine from us when we were engaged in war and no question was raised; England has taken such ships repeatedly from other nations at war. They say that the London convention, composed of delegates of the various nations, prohibits us from buying these ships; but what are the facts? The facts of the matter are that the various nations gave their suggestions to the London convention called to compile the rules of international law and, in reference to this matter, said that under international law only the matter of good faith was involved in such transfers; that any neutral nation could buy interned ships of belligerents if good faith existed in the matter of the purchase. And then, after they got through with the London convention, the managers for England reported on what was done at that convention. Here is a report made to the British Government:

> The provisions respecting transfers made during a war are less complicated. The general rule is that such transfers are considered void unless it be proved that they were not made with a view to evade the consequences which the retention of enemy nationality during war would entail. This is only another way of stating the principle already explained that transfers effected after the outbreak of hostilities are good if made bona fide, but that it is for the owners of the vessels transferred to prove such bona fides.

In other words, they reported a rule restating exactly what has always been stated before, and at the outbreak of hostilities England issued an order, Germany issued a lot of orders, and the United States has issued an order; and they say that the English order is going to be enforced absolutely, because England has the courts, because England will take our ships into the jurisdiction of the English courts, and that of course the English courts will do as England makes them. The English law, if it is international law, does not get its power from the London convention, because it is admitted that it has not been adopted; but it gets its power and force from the order issued by the Admiralty, by the British Government. Well, now, our Secretary of State issued an order to the contrary. He said officially that the London convention is not binding. Germany issued an order the other day telling us that they had a right to create a war zone around the British Isles, and I suppose we have got to assume as true whatever the German Government says; if the German courts can get hold of a vessel in that area such will rule according to whatever the German Kaiser says. There is no truth in these contentions. The court will have to decide according to international law—not governmental orders—subject to arbitration if the Government is dissatisfied with the court's finding.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BRYAN. Give me two minutes more.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. BRYAN. There has been one other argument made here in reference to contraband. It is said that the Government entering into this shipping will get into trouble over contraband or that we can not carry contraband goods. Well, of course the Government of the United States will know what goes into a vessel of its own; the Government of the United States will be careful about what kind of goods it carries, and we can carry some legitimate commerce across the seas. It will no longer be the case that lumber and noncontraband articles can not be carried, because they can not afford to pay the tremendous freight rates that are charged on munitions of war and contraband articles. We will get across the ocean some legitimate commerce, some of the things that the people of this country want to continue their trade in, and some things that they ought to continue their trade in, and they will not bring protests from all sections of the country because contraband is being taken. The United States Government will know what is carried in all the ships, and that is one of the arguments in behalf of the Government going into legitimate, straightforward business, and business that amounts to something.

We have met three or four emergencies at this session of Congress, and it gives me the keenest kind of delight to see us go to Government ownership in things of this kind. It is known that I believe in Government ownership of all the means of interstate commerce in this country. I am glad enough to see you accept that remedy. It gratifies me to see you get to the real thing.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. STEVENS].

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, I voted against the rule because I was opposed to such a drastic and unnecessary restriction upon debate and the right to offer amendments. But I shall vote for the bill, because I am heartily and entirely in favor of it. This bill, Mr. Speaker, not only will do something to meet the present emergency, but it will do something to start a real American merchant marine. I think every man here admits that the people of the United States ought to have their own merchant marine. Private capital has not gone into that business in the last 60 years. There are only three possible ways in which you can build up an American merchant marine. First, you might repeal all the navigation laws and all the ship-registry laws; but that will never be done, and I do not think it ought to be done, because a large part of those laws were passed for the purpose of protecting life at sea and protecting sailors at sea, and the sentiment in this country will not stand for a repeal of those humanitarian regulations. Then you have left only two other ways in which you can build up the merchant marine. One is to grant a subsidy to private corporations. That has been against Democratic policy, and I do not believe we will ever have that law in this country. The only other method that remains is for the Government to go into the business directly itself, which is the proper, democratic, and legitimate way. The Government will then have absolute control of rates and service and everything connected with the merchant marine. If we grant a subsidy to private corporations we still would have no opportunity to control transportation rates upon the seas. If we own the ships we can fix our own rates and our own service. For these reasons I am in favor of this bill.

Now, just a word about the international aspects. The strongest speech made here to-day in opposition to this bill was made by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. This statement of the law was clear and convincing, but his assumption of what the facts are going to be was entirely unfounded and unreasonable. To carry contraband would violate neutrality, but every man knows that these ships will not carry contraband. While I would be glad to see an amendment put in this bill stating specifically that these ships shall not carry contraband, that amendment would not make it any surer or any clearer than it is that these ships will never carry contraband goods. No administration having full control of these ships and of the cargoes that go into them would ever for a moment consider shipping contraband goods. So there is no danger from that source.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. Is it the gentleman's position then that if England had declared all foodstuffs destined for Germany contraband, these ships would not carry any foodstuffs to Germany?

Mr. STEVENS of New Hampshire. Yes, sir; it is.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Hampshire yields back one minute.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, this proposition is one in which I am very much interested. In the Democratic caucus I offered two amendments to this bill which I should have liked very much to have adopted. I voted against the previous question.

I wanted to offer those amendments here. I am unalterably opposed to the coastwise ship monopoly, and would be willing to make almost any sacrifice of any opinion I might have in reference to ships, in order that we might be able to break up such monopoly. [Applause.] Now, I should like——

Mr. MURDOCK. By the way, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. SISSON. I will.

Mr. MURDOCK. The terms of this bill, as I read them, absolutely exclude these ships from participation in coastwise traffic.

Mr. SISSON. Unless they are American ships. In other words, the United States Government under this bill could have an American-built ship engage in the coastwise trade just as an American citizen could. But I thought this was a great opportunity to put in this bill a provision that the ships that might be purchased or built by the United States Government might be able to get a cargo made up from several ports in the United States for the foreign trade or hauling freight from one port to another. Therefore, I offered amendments in the caucus for the purpose of accomplishing that result. In order that I might be able to offer that amendment in the House, I voted against the previous question. There are some features of the bill I do not like.

If I had the writing of the bill, I would strike some of the features out of it. There are others that I would put in the bill. But on the final passage of the bill I am going to vote for it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] My principal reason for doing so is this: If the Government shall go into the shipping business during this emergency and shall continue in the shipping business until the people can realize that the Government is excluded from doing business in her own ports from port to port in a ship which the Government has built on the Clyde, I do not believe that the masses of the American people will stand much longer for this iniquitous coastwise monopoly. And if we can by any means get the American people aroused to the extent that they are willing to demand of Congress that you shall give the people of the United States the right to buy their ships where and when they please and put them in the coastwise trade, then we will have accomplished a great deal by this legislation.

An illustration of the wickedness of the rates of this monopoly which the American people are now paying is illustrated in coal for the Navy. The Secretary of the Navy, in a statement which he made some time ago, stated that he was giving the contracts to foreign ships to haul coal from the Atlantic seaboard to the Pacific coaling stations, and that in some cases when he would get a quotation of the rates from the coastwise monopoly it would be $8 a ton around the Horn, and the foreign shipowners carried the coal for him at $4 a ton.

Now, he is violating the law when he does that, but they dare not prosecute the Secretary of the Navy. They dare not institute against him proceedings that would bring before the American people this great iniquity. And if we could get the people to thoroughly understand the enormous prices which they are paying for the coastwise shipping, joined as it is with the railroads of the country, which own, perhaps, the majority of all the ships, they would realize the situation as it is. The Standard Oil Co., the Beef Trust, the Fruit Trust, and the Steel Trust all own coastwise shipping; and if I could break that up in any way I would make all sorts of sacrifices to do it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] use some of his time?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. The gentlemen on that side have lots of time.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I want to conclude in one speech.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, under the circumstances I will make the point of no quorum, so that Members may be notified of the opportunity to speak, and so be present.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MACDONALD].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes the point of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and thirty-five gentlemen are present, not a quorum.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] moves a call of the House. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this roll call 276 Members, a quorum, have answered to their names.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MACDONALD] 10 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. MACDONALD. Mr. Speaker, in common with other members of the Progressive Party in the House I find myself upon this measure in exactly the same situation in which we have found ourselves on many other vital measures that this Congress has considered. We discover that we are committed in favor of the name that is attached to the legislation, and in many cases to a great deal of the substance in the legislation that is offered for passage. And as most of us generally have on the progressive measures that the Democratic administration have offered found ourselves able to vote for the measure, so I expect to vote for this measure. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I should have liked, as many Progressives on this floor would have liked, a chance to amend the bill and an opportunity as well to have debated the bill at some greater length than is permitted by this rule.

I would like the Democrats of the House to understand, if they can, something of the position in which the members of the Progressive Party have found themselves during this Congress. I would like the Democrats particularly to understand this, because they are the special beneficiaries of the existence of the Progressive Party. [Applause on the Republican side.] The Democrats have not shown any disposition to realize that, as far as I can see. [Laughter.] Instead of extending any helping hand to the Progressives in this Congress they have been content always to accept our help grudgingly and reluctantly, and upon the whole have played second fiddle to the stand-pat Republicans in exhibiting wholesale contempt for us as a party. [Laughter.] In the name of political consistency, I would like to know if the Democrats have not about realized by this time that their hope of continued political existence remains in the Progressive people of this country? They will not get anything by an appeal to the reactionary element in the country, because that is owned and controlled, and always will be, by the Republican Party. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

As I say, our position here has been made so uncomfortable, we have been so lonely that we have felt ourselves, as far as our position here is concerned, Ishmaelites indeed; and is it any wonder that some members of our party here, under the strain and stress of this condition in which they have been placed, have become somewhat crazed, and in their delirium have actually returned to the camp of the standpatters, in the idea that they are returning to friends! [Laughter.]

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACDONALD. I yield for a question.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Does not the gentleman realize that the Democrats were friendly to him personally in his contest?

Mr. MACDONALD. I do; but I am not talking personally. I am talking of a party matter.

Mr. O'HAIR. You got only what you were entitled to.

Mr. MACDONALD. In regard to this present bill, I think that is a very important alignment, along progressive lines. We find the reactionary element in the Republican Party without exception opposed to this legislation. Many of them are opposed to it because they say that it involves Government ownership. Strange to say, some others are honestly opposed to it because they believe it does not mean Government ownership. But it does to some extent mean Government ownership.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. METZ] unknowingly disclosed a very peculiar frame of mind. He said, "I am opposed to Government ownership. 'Government ownershisp is a fad,' a temporary thing, something that is 'simply the whim of a moment'; but we are confronted by a condition that renders it necessary now to take this step, although it may seem to involve Government ownership."

That is just the point exactly. The Government, in view of the world condition with which we find ourselves confronted, is forced, for the sake of protecting itself and the people, to adopt these methods. If this were a measure presented here for the benefit of some large private interest we would have gentlemen on the Republican side, as I have heard them many times before, standing here urging us in the name of the good people to forget partisanship and hold up the hands of the President. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, there is no condition of which I can conceive, threatened war or anything else, that would involve a more grave situation in regard to the welfare of the American people than we are confronted with to-day. The world is at war. It is tearing loose from all its old moorings and ideas; and if we are to maintain our position in the world, if we are to give our people the things to which they are entitled, if we are to maintain the great place in the sun that the American people have made for themselves, it seems to me that now above all other times is the time to forget partisanship, the time to forget the chance that men may have for the return to the political fleshpots again, and to stand by the President in this legislation. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Because, while the President may be the captain of the team, while he may be the leader of one of the political parties of this country, I am satisfied that he and his Cabinet advisers know that there are conditions existing that require this measure to be passed for the benefit of the whole American people, and I do not believe there is a man within the sound of my voice who does not know that that is true. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, in regard to this question of war. Under other conditions we have heard the President charged with being cowardly, supine, afraid to assert American rights, afraid to protect American citizens in Mexico through a cowardly fear of war. I do not believe the President or his advisers have changed their attitude in regard to peace since that time, and I think it is perfectly safe to leave that question to them. In any event, we as a Nation can not get off the earth. We can not sacrifice our rights and our duties as a Nation and as a people and supinely lie down in the face of world-wide conditions that we must meet. Without imputing wrong motives to gentlemen who differ with us upon this subject, it seems to me that those who advance this war scare are simply putting up a bugaboo of war for the purpose of justifying an opposition to the bill which is in reality based upon other reasons. I mean to say I do not question the motives of other gentlemen, but it seems to me that those who argue that this means a declaration of war are using that as an argument for lack of a better. They are carried away by their partisan zeal and their desire to defeat this legislation. They allow themselves to be led into a belief in an argument that is not a real argument at all. We are not likely to have war by reason of the Government being in charge of these ships. The Government is less likely to ship contraband articles than a private owner of ships would be. And I am sure that the ships that are purchased and used under this bill will be used for no other purpose than the necessary purpose of serving the commerce of the Nation that can be served without involving us in war. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THOMSON].

Mr. THOMSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that, as one of the Progressives in this House, I am against this bill. [Applause on the Republican side.] Because I do not consider it a progressive measure and because I do not consider it as presented to us in a progressive way. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I do not know whether my good friend from Michigan [Mr. MACDONALD] in stating, as he did, the position of the Progressives in the House, intended to speak for all of us, but he certainly did not set forth my position on this proposition that is before us to-night.

For my part I can not see how it can be considered a progressive or proper way of legislating to come into this House, after a month or six weeks of discussion in the Senate over a bill of such importance as this, and move to discharge a committee from the consideration of another bill—the Weeks bill—and tack this ship-purchase bill on to that other bill when the ship-purchase bill has not even been introduced in the House or considered by a committee or reported to the House, and then to bring it in here under a rule limiting debate to six hours and have this new legislation provide that this vehicle—the Weeks bill—shall not go into effect for a certain length of time and that the new proposition—the ship-purchase bill—shall go into effect immediately. That seems to me to be the most reactionary way of legislating I can possibly conceive of. [Applause on the Republican side.]

If you wanted to legislate decently and in order why did you Democrats not introduce the ship-purchase bill into the House, refer it to a committee, have that committee consider it and report it back to the House, and then give us a reasonable chance to debate it. A minority has a right to a reasonable opportunity to be heard on legislation, and I believe that progressive methods of legislating would give that right to the minority, and they are not given it by this rule. It seems to me that the only effect of this bill will be to use, what my friend from Kentucky described as a mere bagatelle, $40,000,000 of public funds to buy ships that can only have one destination, and that is confiscation in a prize court. [Applause on the Republican side.]

My colleague, Dr. TEMPLE, quoted decisions here on the floor which nobody has attempted to answer, which prove that if we purchase these ships now in belligerent ownership and attempt to operate them, they will be seized and sent into a prize court, and under these precedents there can be only one decision in those courts, and that is one adverse to our interests. Certainly you must have your eyes on the purchase of these ships. All the others are already engaged in carrying cargoes abroad. As Dr. TEMPLE pointed out, the owner of a German ship now tied up in one of our ports can only convey a title to that ship subject to the same restrictions that he himself would be subject to in operating the ship. He has shown that these restrictions involve the seizure of the ship, and the trial of the question as to whether or not it should be confiscated in a foreign prize court, and under the decisions that he cited we would suffer an adverse decision.

As I said in the beginning, the whole bill impresses me as not being progressive legislation, and the way in which it is presented to us as reactionary as we could possible imagine. Therefore I shall vote against the bill. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were 71 ayes and 137 noes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 78, nays 218, answered "present" 4, not voting 123, as follows:

So the motion to adjourn was rejected.

The Clerk announced the following additional pair:

For the session:

Mr. UNDERWOOD with Mr. MANN.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I voted "yea." I have a general pair with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and I desire to withdraw my vote and be recorded "present."

The name of Mr. MANN was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote "yea."

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall, listening, when his name should have been called?

Mr. GILLETT. No; I was not. I supposed that this was on a no-quorum vote.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not bring himself within the rule.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to proceed.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LINDBERGH].

Mr. LINDBERGH. Mr. Speaker, I shall not vote for 51 per cent Government ownership, with the burden on the Government to establish a profitable business for 49 per cent private proprietorship, while the Government bears the cost of operating until the business pays and then abandons it, as the President recommends in his message to Congress. Either the Government should go into the business or it should stay out of the business. It should do the business for all the people or it should not do it at all.

I would vote for absolute Government ownership of ships. I voted for Government ownership of the Alaskan railways, but would have much preferred to have voted for a bill to provide for Government ownership of the railways in the States, where it would serve the economic interests of the people.

I believe this is a bad time to attempt buying ships. There are none for sale, so far as we have been informed, unless it is the interned ships now lying in our ports, and which under present conditions are tied up and can perform no service until the end of the European war. If the Government is going to own ships, I believe in the Government owning ships absolutely, without a partnership or association with any other than the entire people of the United States. I am unable to find any provision in this bill for which I can vote, and for that reason I shall vote against it. [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman yields back one minute.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. STEPHENS].

Mr. STEPHENS of California. Mr. Speaker, this morning's newspapers quote the Speaker of the House as being against Government ownership, but for this bill. I take the opposite stand—I am for Government ownership of certain utilities, but against this bill unless amended. I am against it because I am for Government ownership of certain steamship lines, and think this bill as it is written jeopardizes that cause. I am against it because it proposes to sell stock to individuals, when the stock can not possibly pay money dividends for many years. I do not think the United States Government should engage in "blue-sky" promotions. The Government should own all the stock.

Mr. Speaker, I have introduced three different bills favoring Government-owned and Government-operated steamship lines. The last one was put in a short time ago, and is as follows:

A bill (H. R. 21440) providing for the construction of naval auxiliaries and for their operation as merchant vessels in time of peace.

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of further increasing the Naval Establishment of the United States the President of the United States is hereby authorized to have built in the Atlantic and Pacific shipyards of the United States naval auxiliaries not exceeding 30 in number, said vessels to be suitable for use as merchant vessels in time of peace.

SEC. 2. That the President is hereby authorized to charter, assign, or transfer any or all of the vessels provided for by this act, and such naval auxiliaries now belonging to the Naval Establishment of the United States as are suitable for commercial use and which are not required for use in the Navy in time of peace, to the Panama Railroad Co. or to any other corporation owned wholly by the United States, and organized for the purpose of acquiring and operating vessels in the intercoastal or foreign trade of the United States, on such terms and conditions as the President of the United States shall prescribe: Provided, That vessels so chartered, assigned, or transferred shall be used in intercoastal traffic between the principal Atlantic and Pacific ports of the United States and between the ports of the United States and the ports of Mexico, Central America, and South America, and such other foreign ports as the President may designate: Provided further, That all vessels so chartered, assigned, or transferred shall be retransferred to the Naval Establishment upon the written order of the President of the United States when in his judgment said vessels are needed for the paramount duties of the Navy.

SEC. 3. That for the purpose of constructing the vessels herein authorized, and for organizing, inaugurating, and carrying on of the traffic provided for in this act, the sum of $30,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That not more than $500,000 of the $30,000,000 herein appropriated shall be used in organizing, inaugurating, and carrying on said traffic.

SEC. 4. That for the purpose of reimbursing the Treasury of the United States the Secretary of the Treasury shall, with the approval of the President, issue and sell or use any of the bonds of the United States now available in the Treasury of the United States under the act of August 5, 1909, the act of February 4, 1910, and the act of March 2, 1911, relating to the issue of bonds for the construction of the Panama Canal, to an amount not exceeding the actual expenditure under this act.

Mr. Speaker, if the bill we are to vote on to-day is passed within the next few weeks, the shipping board will find no vessels it can purchase at anything like a fair price except vessels owned by subjects of nations now at war. All American-built ships and all neutral-built ships are engaged at high rates, and if for sale at all are priced at exorbitant figures. Because England has control of the seas many German vessels are now interned in American harbors, and because of recent war-zone proclamations by Germany many British merchant ships are being laid up in American ports. The maintenance of these in extended idleness is tremendously expensive, and their owners, because afraid to send them out, are willing to sell at a sacrifice.

These war-owned vessels are the only ones, then, that are at all likely to be purchased, and certain it is that the transfer of each and every one of them carries with it either the probability of being tied up in the admiralty courts of one of the nations at war or else the possibility of war between the United States and some one of the belligerents.

Mr. Speaker, why should we purchase trouble? Why should we put ourselves in position to have our flag on a Government-owned vessel hauled into the courts of a foreign nation? Why should we deliberately send out our Government-owned merchant ships to be shot at? Mr. Speaker, would it not be better for every one of us to wait until the war is over to purchase foreign ships? Would not the American people profit more, and would we not be surer of continued peace in the Nation if we postponed our purchases of vessels owned by belligerent people until after the present war has ceased?

Mr. Speaker, what this Nation should do is to build ships, construct them in American shipyards, for the benefit of American labor, American merchants, and American capital, and when finished place them in the intercoastal carrying trade between the principal ports of the Atlantic, including Gulf, coast and the principal ports of the Pacific coast of the United States for the benefit of American shippers and American consumers; also place them in trade between the United States, Central America, and South America.

Mr. Speaker, I believe in Government-owned ships for regulatory and pioneer purposes, and I know the Pacific coast would profit greatly by an intercoastal Government-owned, through the canal, traffic line. The Atlantic and Gulf coasts would gain still more, and all would in time be benefited by Government lines to South America.

Mr. Speaker, the Panama Railroad Co. has four merchant ships; the Army and the Navy each have several that can be converted. In all there may be 20 vessels which the Government could put into these two avenues of trade. That number would reasonably supply demands, regulate rates, and pioneer trade for the first year. By that time we can have ready at least half of the vessels proposed in this bill. We can build quickly. Evidence given before the House Naval Committee in August, 1914, includes:

STATEMENT OF MR. FREDERICK W. WOOD, PRESIDENT OF THE MARYLAND STEEL CO., SPARROWS POINT, MD.

(See pages 196 and 197 of the House hearings on Senate bill 5259, known as the Weeks bill.)

Mr. TALBOTT. Mr. Wood, you had a conversation with me a few days ago, in which you suggested what you thought might be a good policy for the Government to pursue in the construction of vessels for use in the trade that we wish to develop. I wish you would give us your views about the matter, with a statement of your standpoint, your knowledge of shipbuilding, construction, cost, etc.

Mr. WOOD. It depends, Mr. Chairman, on what you desire to accomplish.

Mr. TALBOTT. Perhaps I can help you a little on that. Suppose we should want a number of colliers of from 10,000 to 12,000 tons displacement and 14 knots speed—taking that as the basis of displacement, speed, and carriage capacity, and then the fact that they are to be converted into auxiliary vessels for the Navy——

Mr. WOOD. Is your question when could they be constructed?

Mr. TALBOTT. How long would it take to construct them, and what would be the probable cost? Just give us your views about it.

Mr. WOOD. Ships of from 10,000 to 12,000 tons displacement would be of the type of the Hector, Mars, and Vulcan, three colliers now owned by the Government. In the present condition of the coast shipyards, 12 ships of that type, I think, could be constructed in from 9 to 11 months.

Mr. STEPHENS. Would the first delivery be made in nine months?

Mr. WOOD. I think so.

Mr. STEPHENS. And how often would deliveries be made afterwards?

Mr. WOOD. I think that you could get six of them in from 9 to 10 months and the other six from 10 to 11 months. They would be scattered over the different shipyards.

Mr. STEPHENS. If a contract were given you to-day for three such vessels, what would be the earliest moment when you could turn them over complete?

Mr. WOOD. If we pursued the ordinary course of working only day turns, it would require about 12 months, I should say, for any one of the shipyards to handle three of them. If the price or the amount of money involved would permit working double turns, or the entire 24 hours, the time might be cut down a month and a half, making the first delivery in 7½ months and the last in about 10 months.

Mr. Speaker, we can accomplish great good, and along peaceful lines, if we will. We can keep the money in this country or send it abroad. As for me, I am for American homes, American labor, and American capital. I am for Government ownership in the interest and for the welfare of the American people, and for those reasons only. I am against this bill because I believe it is so worded as to bring trouble, perhaps war, and because it does not authorize or permit intercoastal traffic.

If it could have been amended to avoid foreign courts and foreign complications and permit Government-owned vessels in traffic between the east and west coasts of the United States, I would vote for it. If it is so amended when it comes back from the Senate, I shall support it with all my might. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I know how humiliating it must be to the many Members on the Democratic side of the House who are voting for this bill contrary to their judgments. If it is not humiliating to you, gentlemen, then I mistake your character for manliness, because if there ever was forced upon a majority action that the majority of the majority believed to be unwise, this is the instance. If it were a mere question of domestic policy, then humiliation would be the only thing that might cause you regret.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. TOWNER. I have only 10 minutes; however, I yield for a question.

Mr. GLASS. I want to know who commissioned the gentleman to speak for the majority of the majority and to make a statement that is utterly unwarranted in fact?

Mr. TOWNER. And who commissioned the gentleman to speak for the majority? I have just as much right as he to voice my opinion of existing conditions.

Mr. GLASS. I speak because I am of the majority. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. TOWNER. I have just as much right to my opinion of the majority as has the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. But the gentleman does not assert an opinion. He asserts an alleged fact, which is not a fact at all. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, I am expressing my opinion regarding the matter. That opinion may be of no value in the estimate of gentlemen, but I will venture to say this, that the vast majority of the people of the United States believe that you are humiliated, and they believe that it is contrary to your judgment and they believe that you are doing it——

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. I decline to yield further. They believe that you are doing it, not because you want to, but because it is forced upon you. That is the opinion of the people of the country. I want to say this to you gentlemen—and I have no desire certainly to be unpleasant in my expression regarding it—that if it were a mere question of domestic policy that would be a question that might be left to settle itself, but this is not a mere question of domestic policy. It is a question that is much more serious than that.

The circumstances that surround this case make it almost certain that if you shall succeed in carrying this measure through and putting this plan into operation, that you will carry the Nation into war. The circumstances make it almost certain to lead to that result. This bill is for the purchase of ships. But it means more than that. It means the purchase of certain ships. It means more than that. It means the purchase of German interned ships. You have refused in this House, and it has been refused elsewhere by those high in authority, to limit the purchase of ships to those that are not interned, to take action to preserve this country from the dangers of war, but you refuse to do that. Logically in your view you are compelled to purchase these interned ships if you desire really to increase the shipping facilities. There are no ships available for purchase that will increase the shipping facilities of this country except the German interned ships. You can not build ships to meet this emergency because you have not the time to do so. There is nothing left for you to do except to purchase the German interned ships, and that this administration proposes to do.

The man who will be the governor of this board stated that was the purpose and intention. Time and time again persons who are connected with this movement have refused to say that such was not their purpose and intention. Now, gentlemen, what will that mean? It will not do, as has been said on the floor of this House by gentlemen who are here to-night, to say that it has long been the policy of the United States, that it has long been the policy of Great Britain, to allow the transfer of belligerent vessels to a neutral power after war had commenced. That will not do in this emergency, for the reason that those nations that are at war have declared that for this time and during this period, during this emergency, during this war, they will hold that such transfers can not be made. And so it makes no difference what has been our past policy, it makes no difference what has been the past policy of Great Britain, when Great Britain said, as she did say, shortly after the opening of the war along in last August, that she expected to be governed by the rule of the declaration of London, except with regard to certain things that are not involved in this controversy, when she affirmatively said that she would adopt a rule that, in effect, says that no belligerent ship can be transferred to a neutral Government after war had been declared for the purpose of escaping the consequence of the war, you are led inevitably into this position—that if you purchase these German interned ships, knowing that the purchase will be held void by those who are now engaged in war, you know that those ships will be taken before their prize courts. You know that their prize courts will hold that the transfer was illegal. You know that the ships, and perhaps their cargoes, will be confiscated. Under these circumstances, what will the United States do? We should remember that in the face of this statement by those countries, knowing what their position would be, knowing what the result of their prize-court finding would be, we have deliberately engaged in this business.

Now, we must either say we insist on our rights to that transfer, and that leads inevitably to war, or else we will submit under circumstances that this Nation can never agree to, if I know anything regarding its spirit. Why should we be forced into such a position as this? Why do you gentlemen force the country into such a condition as this?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly I do.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman from Iowa introduced a bill providing for Government ownership and control of ships. I think it was referred to my committee. Does the gentleman think if that were enacted into law that these same results might follow an indiscreet administration of the law?

Mr. TOWNER. That measure was for the purchase of ships as auxiliaries of the Navy. That certainly would not lead us into war.

Mr. ALEXANDER. And were they not to be used for commercial purposes?

Mr. TOWNER. They were to be used for commercial purposes under certain circumstances; yes——

Mr. ALEXANDER. And that might not lead us into war, according to the gentleman's theory.

Mr. TOWNER. There would be nothing in such a purchase that would in any way embarrass us in our relations with any country now at war. It is perfectly proper for us to increase our Navy in this form and for this purpose, and certainly we can do so without incurring any violation of neutrality. But to do as is now proposed to do, to purchase these interned vessels and send them to belligerent ports, load them with that which will be regarded as contraband of war, and send them into prize courts, where they are almost certain to be subject to confiscation, is to lead us almost inevitably into war. These are the circumstances which surround us now, and I believe that there ought to be enough independence of character, there ought to be enough regard for the rights of our country, there ought to be enough regard for the opinion of this Nation that would keep us from such a dangerous course of procedure. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the other side to use some time.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. [Applause.]

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, I did not ask that any time be yielded me; but, perhaps, I should express appreciation of the invitation of the gentleman from Missouri to me to indicate to the House my views on the pending question. Mr. Speaker, I experience not one particle of difficulty in giving my support to this measure.

I do not believe it is socialistic; I do not believe it is undemocratic; I do not believe it is un-American, but I believe it is an essential, though latent, function of Government, proper to be exercised whenever the time arrives for its expression. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It has been exercised, in greater or less degree, by the municipalities of this and other countries, by the States, and not infrequently by the United States Government. The town in which I live has for 90 years owned its own waterworks and has in recent years expended $1,000,000 upon the system. A town not far removed from mine, in the district of my colleague, Judge SAUNDERS, has for 10 or 15 years owned its own gas plant. The great city of New York, if I mistake not, has expended recently several hundred millions of dollars to acquire rights and to establish its own waterworks system. The States have exercised this function. My own State of Virginia has built railroads and canals; and the most valuable investment that it has to-day, contributing largely to the educational facilities of the Commonwealth, is its partnership in the Richmond, Fredericksburg & Potomac Railroad, operating between Washington and Richmond.

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLASS. I have but 10 minutes, which seem to have been thrust upon me, and I want to express my attitude in that time without controversy upon this or the other side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia declines to yield.

Mr. GLASS. And I think that the exercise now of this function of government to acquire ownership of or partnership in a corporation to operate vessels in the across-seas trade is a perfectly legitimate exercise of a governmental function. Nor am I so anxious to make it temporary as some gentlemen seem disposed to be. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am not so sure that the emergency is as great as has been described; but, Mr. Speaker, I venture the assertion that the greatest good, if not the only good, that will come to America out of this war is the accentuation at this time of the failure of the Government of the United States to guard the Republic against just such a situation as that which confronts us to-day. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The Republican Party, having possession of the Government for 40 out of the last 55 years, has neglected to do that, although in its national conventions since 1884 it has solemnly and emphatically declared that an efficient merchant marine is one of the greatest necessities of the country. And while here, to-day, the Democratic Party is charged with neglect and omission, one of the very gentlemen who persist in making this a partisan question stood upon the floor of the House four years ago—I mean the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY]—and charged his own party with the responsibility and the "shameful neglect" of failing to provide this country with a merchant marine. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He was unmistakable in his denunciation of the Republican Party and in his ascription to that party, and that party alone, of responsibility for this failure. He stated in terms that the Republican Party up to the time of his speech, May 20, 1910, had never made an honest effort to provide a merchant marine for this country.

Mr. Speaker, there has been expended here a good deal of nonsense about "instructions from the White House." There have been no instructions from the White House. The spirit of independence on the Democratic side of the House certainly has always equaled, if it has not surpassed, the independence of action that has characterized the conduct of the Republican Party in the House during the 14 years that I have been a Member of this body. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Instructions from the White House! Have you gentlemen forgotten the time when your President sent down to this body a railroad bill drafted by his Attorney General, and not one of you would dare to offer to cross a "t" or dot an "i" in it? [Applause on the Democratic side.] Socialism! Have you gentlemen forgotten that, within the last 60 days, the greatest Republican President, perhaps, who has sat in the White House since the time of Lincoln, has stated over his own signature that, during the memorable industrial disturbance in the State of Pennsylvania, he was prepared to take over, and was on the eve of seizing, the property of the coal operators and conducting those mines for and in the name of the people of the United States? [Applause on the Democratic side.] We are not proposing that sort of confiscation here. We are not proposing in the emergency of war to seize the vessels owned by the Shipping Trust. But we are proposing to exercise a perfectly well-established governmental function in buying vessels and operating them in order to relieve a situation that is a conceded disgrace to the American Government, and for which the Republican Party is largely responsible by years of legislative impotency and neglect. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] is never happier than when he is heaping abuse upon Democratic public officials, and especially upon the President of the United States. He tells us that men on this side are "cursing the President in the cloakroom and praising him upon the floor." Well, Mr. Speaker, at least it must be conceded that Members on this side of the House are exercising better taste than the gentleman from the State of Washington. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It could well be wished that the coarse and vituperative abuse which that gentleman, on the floor of the House, has persistently heaped upon the President of the United States, regardless of the dignity of the office and the patriotism of the man who occupies it, might be confined to the cloakroom if the cloakroom would tolerate such intemperate beratings. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Indeed it seems to me that the sort of vituperation and disparagement of which the gentleman from Washington is constantly guilty is better suited to the stable than to the cloakroom. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And I am sure there is no Member of the House on this side who would challenge the gentleman's preeminence in that species of detraction. I even venture to believe that there is not a Member of the House on that side who would care to emulate his example or seek to appropriate his laurels. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I have observed the course of this debate, and I find two objections urged against this proposition. It is first contended that this bill, if enacted into law, will interfere with private enterprise and, secondly, that it will endanger the peace of the country. No other argument has been advanced why this bill should not be enacted into law. These two objections I will in the course of my remarks answer, if not to the satisfaction of those who oppose this bill, at least to the satisfaction of myself and those who favor the bill.

Serious complaint is indulged by gentlemen that the "gag rule" has been applied; that we intend to jam this bill through without sufficient consideration. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] said that there were no hearings and that this bill was drafted without deliberation and without the information upon which to intelligently act. In this he is very much mistaken. I am not a member of the Committee on the Merchant Marine, and do not know what investigation was made by that committee, nor how fully informed the members were when the Alexander bill was reported to this House during the last session. The Weeks bill, which constitutes the first four sections of the present bill, is the product of years of careful study of this subject by the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, and unanimously, I am informed, passed the Senate upon full consideration early in the month of last August. That bill was sent to this House and was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and by that committee referred to a subcommittee, of which I had the honor to be a member. That subcommittee gave much time and thought to the Weeks bill, and had hearings covering a period of 10 days, with many material witnesses who gave valuable information to the committee.

The committee being advised, cooperated in drafting the Alexander bill, and particularly secured in the Alexander bill the incorporation of that provision authorizing that all ships purchased should be of a type, so far as practicable, suitable for auxiliary use in the Navy, and be transferred to the use of the Navy when no longer used for the purposes of commerce or when required for the paramount needs of the Navy, upon the order and direction of the President. The Alexander bill formed the basis of the Gore bill, which constitutes a part of the pending bill. So I say that it is not true and the gentlemen misstate the fact when they inform this House and the country that there has been no consideration of the present bill. The Gore bill is but an amendment of the Alexander bill, so that the bill now pending in this House is the Weeks bill and the Alexander bill as amended by the Gore bill.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will my colleague yield to me for a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. If the Weeks bill was considered to be of such great value, why is it that in its present form it is not expected to go into effect until two years after its passage?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have not said that the Weeks bill standing alone is of such great importance. I do see much merit in the Weeks bill. What I was speaking of was the consideration that has been given to these bills.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I want to be informed. I find that in the print put out early this morning of House resolution 722, on page 9, section 9, no mention is made of Alaska, but in a later print of the same resolution, on line 10 of page 9, section 9, it says, "Vessels purchased or constructed by such shipping board and owned by such corporation," and so forth, "shall engage in trade with foreign countries or Alaska, the Philippines," and so forth. Now, what I want to know is, Will it be possible for one of these Government ships to load with an out cargo and then load abroad a foreign cargo, bring it through the Panama Canal and around to Alaska as against the coastwise trade of Alaska?

Mr. WILLIAMS. As I understand this bill, the amendment which the gentleman indicates precludes these vessels from engaging in the coastwise trade and limits their operation to trade with foreign countries, the Philippines, Porto Rico, and Alaska, the amendment including Alaska being added by the authority of the caucus last evening——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Without debate on the part of anyone who knew anything about it.

Mr. WILLIAMS (continuing). After full discussion, and for the purpose of enabling these vessels to reach the coal fields of Alaska and to deliver that coal wherever it may be needed for purposes of commerce and trade.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. This bill allows ships owned by this company to engage in the coastwise shipping trade, just as ships owned by private companies are allowed to engage in the coastwise shipping trade if they are American-built ships. If they are not American-built ships they can not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is not Alaska by this bill included in the foreign shipping trade?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; but I understand by the terms of this bill ships built in the United States may engage in the coastwise trade.

Much has been said in this argument about who is to blame for the fact that we have no merchant marine. I do not propose to go into that question here to-night. It is sufficient to say that the Democratic Party is not responsible for the disappearance of our merchant marine from the high seas. That has occurred within the 50 years since the Republican Party has been dominant in this country. But I do want to invite attention briefly to the conditions that surround us to-day. These conditions consist of absolute extortion in the way of freight rates for the transportation of American products which are needed in the foreign markets, and to meet this condition we propose to do what private capital has refused to do.

I want to communicate a fact to this House which has not been mentioned thus far in this debate. I can give you, gentlemen, some reason why the President is very much concerned about this proposition. Following the outbreak of hostilities in Europe, when our shipping was disturbed, when German ships were interned in our ports, the President of the United States sent for and held conferences with men engaged in trans-Atlantic transportation. He pointed out to them the conditions which prevailed; he pointed out to them the fact that these interned ships, idle in our harbors, could be purchased in good faith and put into commerce at a very reasonable price; in fact, that they were upon the bargain counter; and he asked these men as patriotic American citizens to invest their capital in these ships and give outlet to the products of the American farm and factory.

What answer do you suppose these patriotic gentlemen, the Shipping Trust, which has been defended for hours upon that side of the House, gave to the President in response to his plea that they invest their money in these enterprises? Their conditions, stated briefly, were these: "We will put our money in this project if you, the Government of the United States, will insure our ships and our cargoes free and guarantee us 4 per cent net upon our investment."

Before proceeding to reply to the contentions of gentlemen that this bill, if enacted into law, will interfere with private business and endanger the peace of America, I wish to invite the attention of the House to the conditions which confront the country now and which appear to render this bill necessary. One thing is true, and all men admit it: That we have no merchant marine; that more than 90 per cent of our foreign trade, both exports and imports, is carried in foreign bottoms at foreign rates fixed by shipping companies which have no interest in America or in American trade other than to profit by the extortionate charges imposed upon us. There has never been but one remedy proposed for this condition of things by the Republican Party, and that in keeping with their usual habit of diverting the American Treasury to the use and benefit of special interests—the proposed ship subsidy—by means of which it has been proposed by the Republican Party, sustained by declarations in their party platforms, to vote money out of the Treasury as a direct subsidy to the shipping interests in order to foster and encourage that industry. The solicitude of our Republican friends for the shipping interests, one of the greatest monopolies on earth, is clearly manifested not only by their former attempts to vote a direct ship subsidy, but by their anxiety here lest we, by creating competition and a means of conveying American products to foreign markets, may interfere with and reduce the profits of this great trust. Some one said this afternoon that the Republican Party can always be depended upon to come to the defense whenever a blow is struck at special interests, and that the Democratic Party can always be relied upon to defend the cause of our country against the encroachments of organized greed. Such has been the course of events during the present Congress, and this spirit has been manifested not only in the opposition to the tariff bill and the enactment of the Federal reserve act, but in the opposition which was urged so strenuously against the repeal of the Panama tolls act and the enactment of the amendments to the antitrust law.

What are the conditions which justify—or, if you please, render necessary—the enactment of this bill? I have already mentioned the fact that we have no merchant marine and that we are at the mercy of the foreign shipping industry, which has at all times practiced extortion upon us. But what of the present conditions? The fact must not be overlooked that the ships engaged in the carrying trade of one of the great commercial nations of the world are completely out of the business. German ships that have not been destroyed on the high seas have taken refuge in neutral ports, and are idle. This affects the shipping business generally and removes the principal competition in the world's commerce, which tended not only to maintain reasonable shipping facilities but to secure reasonable freight rates. In addition to this many of the English ships which formerly were engaged in the ocean carrying trade have been withdrawn and are used in connection with the army and navy, and that again has materially reduced the number of ships engaged in trans-Atlantic trade. So that by these means the number of ships engaged in transporting American products to the marts of the world have been materially reduced, and as a consequence the most extortionate rates exacted ever known in the commercial history of the world. A reference to the tables, which show the tremendous increase in freight rates of 100 to 300 per cent in the brief time since the European war opened, startles the imagination and arouses a sense of indignation that the necessities of man should be taken advantage of by the cupidity of the shipping interests to such an extent as to deprive the people of the world of those commodities which are necessary for the sustenance of life and the maintenance of national existence. These tables, furnished by the Department of Commerce, demonstrate to an absolute certainty that extortion, unjustified and unprecedented, is being practiced upon Americans, and that the profits that we would otherwise derive from the present high prices for food products and the output of our factories are being consumed by a merciless shipping trust, which our Republican friends fear will be interfered with by competition created by this proposed legislation.

When gentlemen assert that we will destroy or seriously impair private industry by Government ownership and regulation of ocean commerce, they mean that we will interfere with the profits that the Shipping Trusts are receiving as a result of extortionate freight charges practiced upon our people. This is the reason for the great concern manifested here and the solicitude expressed by gentlemen on that side of the House who oppose this bill.

The next proposition advanced is that this project will endanger the peace of America. It will be difficult to convince the American public that this administration, which has so nobly maintained the peace of the United States in Mexico and abroad when three-fourths of the civilized world is locked in a death struggle, will do an act or take a step which will endanger the peace of our country. The American people have absolute confidence and implicit faith in the judgment, the wisdom, and the patriotism of Woodrow Wilson, and can not be persuaded by partisan attacks and bitter denunciation that he will, by his recommendation and his solicitude for the welfare of his country and his splendid efforts to secure a market for American products, endanger the peace of our country and involve us in war. The arguments advanced why this bill may endanger our peace are that we have not the legal right under international law to acquire interned vessels, and that if the Government is engaged in the transportation of contraband goods it will become directly involved with nations now engaged in war. The hearings before the committee include the statements of Mr. Lansing, Counselor of the Department of State, who appeared before the committee and gave his views on this important question, and expressed his belief that the use by a private corporation of ships transferred to it by the United States would not involve the United States in serious foreign complications any more than ships otherwise owned and operated by a private corporation.

What does this bill propose? That the United States may become a stockholder in a corporation the object and purposes of which are to aid the commerce of the United States; that the Government shall finance the concern by purchasing and acquiring ships and transfer them to the corporation, in consideration of the bonds of the corporation secured by a lien upon all of its assets; that the United States shall own a controlling interest in the stock of the concern, and reserve the right to withdraw these vessels and use them as auxiliaries in the Navy in case they should be required for that purpose. Now, it is argued from the mere fact that the Government would own stock in a corporation engaged in transportation that the Government itself would be engaged in the business, and that a seizure or search of a vessel owned and operated by the corporation would directly involve the United States. I fail to see the force and logic of this contention. Certainly the corporation itself could not become involved in the use of ships acquired in good faith and for actual consideration in the transportation of food products and other commodities not contraband of war, and I think it may be safely said here that the Government of the United States, owning and controlling a majority of the stock in the concern, will not permit contraband goods to be transported in ships thus acquired and in which the Government has a reversionary interest. It is not the purpose of this bill to convey arms and ammunition and munitions of war to belligerents, but to convey products of the American farm and factory—food and provisions—to stricken people across the Atlantic, who need the necessities of life which we possess in such great abundance. Shall the American Government, for fear that it may interfere with private enterprise and depreciate the excessive profits of the Shipping Trust, refuse the demand for transportation facilities and an outlet to American products?

Let me ask you, gentlemen, if you honestly and in good faith believe that the President of the United States, who has so nobly maintained the peace of our country in Mexico and abroad during these troublous times, proposes to do one thing that will endanger the peace of our country or bring our honor or our integrity into dispute?

Shall the Government of the United States be so unmindful of the interests of its own people as to deny their just demands because somebody says, for political reasons, that we may endanger the peace of the country? Now is the opportune time. I do not advocate the high-handed tactics of some nations who would take advantage of world-wide conditions for territorial aggrandizement and the exaction of treaties and terms and conditions, long coveted, which can not be had in ordinary times or under ordinary conditions, but I do take the position that it is the duty of the Government of the United States to take advantage of conditions as they are and enforce its just demands against the world. I believe it the duty of the Government of the United States to hoist the American flag on every vessel sailing the seas which may become entitled to American registry, load these ships with the surplus products which we have in such great abundance, and say to the world, "There flies the American flag. This cargo bears the seal of the Government of the United States. Hands off!"

What nation now engaged in war would have either the means or the disposition to interfere? England and Germany and France and Russia and Austria have their hands full, each a check on the other, and dare not turn upon the United States and assail the integrity of the American flag on the high seas. As an American, I would give them to understand and proclaim to the world that the bounty of Providence, so liberally bestowed as a reward for American enterprise and American industry, shall be conveyed on the high seas under the American flag to God's creatures everywhere.

It has been said that the people of this country are not in sympathy with this proceeding. Let me say to you that I can speak for one section of this country. I believe I can speak with entire confidence as to the sentiment in the State of Illinois. I say to you that the people of that State, not only Democrats, but Republicans and Progressives as well, are with the President in his effort here to secure fair transportation rates, and they will uphold his hands. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN]. [Applause.]

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I have been delightfully entertained here to-day, but I have not heard a man yet tell you that the trust that is behind this proposition is the real cause of this filibuster that you have had here all day long. [Applause on the Democratic side.] We are confronted with a very serious proposition. We have the greatest trust, a thieving, piratical trust that is oppressing the poor people, the producers of wealth, the farmers, and all other people of this Republic who actually make it a Nation worth living in. Who is it that says the Republican side knows nothing of a Shipping Trust? The distinguished Republican gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] volunteered that remarkable information to this great body about two hours ago. I would like to know if you could take a white-oak maul and a hickory glut and knock Republican eyes open wide enough to see as big a giant as the shipping monopoly is? [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Is it possible that these gentlemen are unaware of the existence of a trust that has been capable of raising the price of freights across the ocean $18,018,700 in the one month of December? These figures are authentic from the office of the Secretary of the Treasury. And if you put this off 12 months, according to that rate, on your export freight alone you will have a total of $216,000,000 in one year increase over the amount charged for hauling the same freight before the ships of some of the nations engaged in war were forced off of the high seas. Then put on to that your import trade, and you have an increase of $312,000,000 in one year for the same quantity of freight carried between the United States and European countries over the normal freight rates. That is eight times this $40,000,000 that this Government proposes to put into the business now. Who has the "gall" to vote against this ship-purchase bill when he knows it will save the American people nearly one-half of a billion dollars in one year on freight that crosses the Atlantic Ocean? Do you tell me there is not a shipping trust? [Applause on the Democratic side.] After the war broke out in Europe this Congress passed a bill authorizing the United States Government to insure the cargoes going to Europe. The insurance rate is one-eighth of 1 per cent, so you see it is plain with such a low rate of insurance that the Shipping Trust is robbing our people, when it has raised the freight on cotton from $1.25 a bale to $18 a bale. This Government can not regulate the rate on the seas. Shall we let the shipping combine rob our people, or shall we lower the freight rate on the seas by putting ships in commission to compete with this blood-sucking vampire. I tell you that the Republicans on this floor are marching under the banner of the Ship Trust that is oppressing the poor people of this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The Republican Party is aiding the greatest trust that ever oppressed the human race. The Republican Party, claiming not to know that there is such a trust, has filibustered in the other end of this Capitol for three long weeks to keep this law from being enacted.

The Republican Party is causing the fame of the United States Senate to be brought into disrepute, and not satisfied with that, the Republicans in this end of the Capitol have proceeded to filibuster here for the same purpose. I want to tell you, my friends, that the American people have not been asleep. They know that this bill will save the situation. They know that none of you are afraid of Government ownership. [Applause on the Democratic side.] They know that the people of this Republic will stand for this bill. They know it is going to build up the merchant marine and break up the Ship Trust, this band of commercial pirates that now has the wealth producers and business men of this country by the throat, and is daily reaching the filthy hands of greed into the pockets of our people. And for one I am not afraid of the Government staying in this business permanently, either. I am for it not only as a temporary measure but I am for it to continue to carry the products of this country to the markets of the world and bring back whatever goods our people need to keep from being plundered by manufacturing trusts in America. [Applause on the Democratic side.] No farmer can depend on borrowing a wagon to haul his produce to town. We ought to have our own ships to carry our produce across the high seas. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And there can never be a better time than right now, when the patriotic President of this country, backed up by Mr. Bryan and that grand old commoner, the Democratic Speaker, together with the Democratic majority in the Senate and in this House, with all of the Democratic hosts of this land, is asking this Congress to pass this measure in the interest of fairness to the people of this great Nation. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

This is a struggle between the people and special privilege. Shall the Ship Trust be permitted to hold up the people and rob them of the fruits of their toil?

You Republicans as a party have always stood for privilege and all of its freebooting activities in exploiting the people. In opposing this bill you mean to allow the Ship Trust a free hand in continuing to rob the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. REILLY], who always speaks words of truth, and who will diversify these proceedings a little. [Applause.]

Mr. REILLY of Connecticut—

CAPT. WILSON ON THE BRIDGE.

There are ships that pass in the night,
And others that pass in the day;
There are some that don't pass at all—
They depend on the syndicate's say.

The Democrats want Uncle Sam
To now build ships that will sail
With cargoes of Yankee-made goods
And land them abroad without fail.

Republicans stand up and howl,
They bellow and threaten and prate;
They fear lest the profits will shrink—
They're friends of the ship syndicate.

They throw out their chests and look wise;
They accuse Democrats of intent
To ruin the trade of the seas;
They claim that we are hell bent.

They say that the syndicate ships,
Now building and those now afloat,
Can get all the business there is,
When they only get Uncle Sam's goat.

The syndicate's real busy now
Making bluffs about building ships,
But it's only because it now sees
The boats in the Government slips.

On the bridge of the great ship of state
Stands Wilson, our captain is he;
It's a pleasure to serve him on land,
It's high honor to sail o'er the sea

With him in the ships that we own,
The craft that will set shippers free
From the grasp of the ravenous crew
To which we have long bent the knee.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

In his care the people feel safe,
They know that he knows their will,
And that's why we rally to-night
To put through the Wilson ship bill.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. ADAMSON. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Seven minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield that time back to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER].

Mr. ALEXANDER. I will ask gentlemen on the other side to use some of their time, as there will be only one other speech on this side. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FARR] four minutes.

Mr. FARR. Mr. Speaker, I am not afraid of the principle of Government ownership involved in this bill, and I am heartily in favor of an American merchant marine; but I do not want this great country, with its high ideals, to establish this principle in the blood, suffering, and sorrow of the great tragedy across the ocean. I am opposed to it because it will involve us in war. [Manifestations of derision on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will remind gentlemen that the more noise they make and the greater racket they keep up, the later they will get to bed. [Laughter.]

Mr. FARR. It may involve us in war, and not with Great Britain, either, because this, in effect, is a pro-British measure. [Cries of "Oh!" on the Democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen must remember that this is not a beer garden or a vaudeville show.

Mr. FARR. Mr. Speaker, England never has been opposed to this bill. It wants us to buy the German interned ships. Every advantage from more ships will accrue to the allies and be to the disadvantage of the Germans. Is there any opportunity for us to send one of our ships to a German port? The allies need our munitions of war and foodstuffs. We have ample bottoms to convey to them their legitimate needs.

The additional ships that we put upon the ocean will be sending powder and other munitions of war and foodstuffs to continue that awful war. I have heard men on the floor of this House say that if the Vollmer resolution, to prevent the exportation of munitions of war, came out of the committee, they would support it, and yet they are going to vote for this bill, which means thousands and thousands of tons of powder and thousands and thousands of tons of other munitions of war to go there to help continue that dreadful warfare.

Let me read from an afternoon newspaper to show you just how thin ice we are skating on:

Germans resent attitude of the United States. Hostile feeling may cause crisis. Americans fleeing Berlin, following criticism in press. German papers stir people with charge that United States is siding with the allies.

We are about to enact into legislation a measure that means advantages to the allies and a danger and an affront to Germany. I want to repeat that in effect this is a pro-British measure and that by making it a law we risk war with Germany; and if we escape war with that great nation we invite its bitter attitude toward us for years and will disturb the good feeling of the German citizens of this country.

Let us preserve our neutrality and avoid war.

My first consideration shall be for peace and the prevention of bloodshed.

By my vote you shall not increase the number of widows, orphans, broken hearts, and wrecked homes in Europe for the advantage of the manufacturers of weapons of war.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts that I was laboring under a misapprehension when I said that there would be only one speech on this side.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD].

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, no time is more inopportune to launch into Government ownership of shipping than the present. As I view the pending bill, it means that we are to purchase the only available ships, and those are the interned German ships. As I pointed out on a prior occasion, the purchase by a citizen of a neutral government of ships registered under a belligerent flag after the outbreak of hostilities does not relieve it of seizure by any belligerent power, and this confiscable character does not change when a government is the purchaser; but such a purchase would be more questionable as to the good faith of the transaction to avoid confiscation, in that it is no part of a government's business to engage in the purchase of merchant ships. Article 56 of the declaration of London expresses the principle of international law in forbidding any such transfer after hostilities have arisen.

Everyone who has been following the diplomatic discussion over the Dacia realizes that our Government would be buying a lawsuit to purchase these interned ships, which do not dare to be operated for fear of confiscation. But I bottom my main objection on the fact that under existing conditions, with England in control of the seas, they will not be used in an impartial, neutral way so that we can supply our wares and our goods to all the belligerent countries alike, but they will be used for the shipment of our merchandise to the powers that have control of the sea.

Nothing is more certain from statistics cited here than that the increase of foreign commerce resulting since the outbreak of the war has been largely of those articles in which the foreign governments now engaged in war are directly using to carry on the war, such as guns, ammunition, automobiles, wearing apparel, leather, foodstuffs, rubber, and everything that enables the warring powers to maintain the dreadful struggle that is going on to-day. If you think that the purchase of these ships will relieve us of embarrassment, I fear you are too sanguine as to the result. As I view it, they will only accentuate the difficulty that now confronts the administration.

Mr. METZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; I can not yield. I know what the gentleman's position is; he is a shipper. Nothing is more certain than that at the present time the American shipper is not paying the freight. The foreign Governments who are taking our foodstuffs, who are demanding our munitions of war, demanding our automobiles, are paying the price asked by the American manufacturers and the American producer, and the European consumer is paying the freight, whether it be a Government or a private establishment. They need our wares and they are paying our price. This bill in its large sense, when you come to analyze its effect, is for the especial benefit, whether so intended I will not say, of those belligerent powers which now have the advantage of getting our supplies—our foodstuffs and munitions of war—and it is certain that Germany and Austria are not in that favored position. It is stated that we are going to use some of these vessels in the South American trade. Why, if the gentleman is sincere in that position, why do you not put the Weeks bill into immediate operation instead of postponing its operation for two years. Everybody who stops to reflect a moment knows that the direct effect of this bill will be to supply the allies with our products, as we have little or no communication to speak of with Germany or Austria. Certainly this is so as far as munitions of war are concerned.

Great Britain since the outbreak of the war has changed its contraband list two or three times by adding articles that have been generally regarded as conditional contraband. Under the declaration of London foodstuffs are conditional contraband and could be shipped in neutral ships without seizure to neutral countries, and even to belligerent countries when not consigned for the benefit of the Government itself. And yet Great Britain in her imperious way has made foodstuffs contraband. These vessels, under section 5 of the bill, are not to be controlled by the shipping board. If you will examine the provisions of section 5, you will see that the shipping board has control of the rates, but that it has no control of the traffic, neither the course nor the character of the cargo, no control of the routes, and only control over the rates for a period not longer than 12 months.

Take the case of a person who desires to ship foodstuffs abroad—not a highly imaginary case by any means when we find the Wilhelmina, a neutral vessel, with a cargo of foodstuffs destined for Germany, being held up by Great Britain and its cargo threatened as a prize if its captain persists on continuing his journey. To what court is that taken Not to the United States court, as this bill provides. No; it is taken to the prize court of Great Britain to have the question of contraband determined by its Admiralty decrees. Are we keeping aloof from this entanglement by entering upon a venture that may lead to such embarrassment?

A large part of the American people, this great body of German-Americans in this country, believe that we are not acting impartially to-day in allowing munitions of war to be sent to the allies alone, with the allies in control of the sea. Do you mean to say that when they see foodstuffs on American vessels destined for Germany, which we regard as conditional contraband and not liable to seizure, captured by Great Britain, that these 5,000,000 of loyal Americans, true to the flag, will permit that insult without a vigorous protest? Oh, my fellow Representatives, these are acute times that confront the American people. We will be on the verge of embarrassing situations if we pass this measure. My only purpose is to have this Government remain absolutely neutral, but you can not operate this shipping bill unless it is going to involve us in difficulties.

There is no question but that the Weeks bill is only a ruse in order to hang this administration shipping bill on, which, as I view it, only accentuates the difficulties that may confront our Government. The mere fact that freight rates are increasing is no justification for our launching into this Government-ownership proposition. Every speech, save one, of the advocates of this proposition has been bottomed on the argument in favor of Government ownership. The distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] justified his position because municipalities and States had indulged in Government ownership of natural monopolies. But I say to him and I say to you, that where the seas are open to everyone who can build a ship, shipping can not be considered a natural monopoly. It is free, and to-day when American capital is seeking to invest its surplus capital that is lying idle in the financial centers, you are driving that capital away from investment, because American capital will never seek investment in competition with the Government. It can not compete, because in every line of activity where the Government has undertaken to invade private employment the rates charged for that service have not been based upon the actual cost of service, but have been rates where fixed charges, allowances for depreciation, and other elements of cost have been ignored completely. Just when the time is auspicious for American capital to invest in ships the Government plans to check this movement by this fatuous policy.

Mr. METZ. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. METZ. Does the gentleman suppose for one moment that if Germany and the Germans felt as the gentleman says he does, we could buy these German ships that are interned here?

Mr. STAFFORD. The German Government has no control over those ships.

Mr. METZ. It has, absolutely.

Mr. STAFFORD. The persons in the companies who own these ships are controlled by the same selfish instincts that the gentleman and I would be in a business matter.

Mr. METZ. Do you——

Mr. STAFFORD. I decline to yield until I can answer the other question, and then I will yield. Those German ships are controlled by private corporations which desire, unquestionably, the release of their capital for investment in lines of profitable employment.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, gentlemen on the other side have not taken advantage of the time allotted to them to discuss this bill. They have been indulging in the same tactics here that the Republican Party has indulged in and is indulging in in the Senate, and while the Democratic Party is trying to bring relief to American shippers they are doing the bidding of the Shipping Trust. [Applause.] We can regulate interstate and intrastate freight rates. We can regulate the shipping rates in our country, but we can not regulate them on the high seas, and gentlemen here know that.

The only way at this time to break the hold that this foreign ship trust has upon the throat of the American people is to operate American ships as is here provided, and carry our produce to the markets of the world. This heartless and cruel monopoly has taken advantage of conditions created by war; and in defiance of every principle of justice and fairness, it is robbing the American people of millions of dollars by its outrageous and oppressive ocean freight rates.

From the time the war in Europe commenced in July to December, 1914, the ocean freight cost increased 141 per cent; and by the increased rate now charged on the shipments of American produce the ship trust collects in two months more money than it will cost our Government to buy and operate these ships. Think of that. The increase in ocean freight rates above that being charged in July, 1914, collected now in two months from American shippers is more than the amount necessary to buy ships to carry the produce of our farms and factories to the markets of Europe.

Mr. Speaker, this merciless monopoly has increased the shipping rate on cotton from $1.25 per bale to $18 and $20 per bale. It has increased the rate on grain 900 per cent; and it has increased in like fashion the rate on coal and lumber and everything that is produced upon the American farm. And yet the Republican Party in both branches of Congress is doing everything in its power to defeat this bill, which proposes to cut down this tremendous ocean freight rate and stop this holdup and robbery of the American people.

The markets of Europe are calling for the products of our farms and factories and our people are suffering because their produce is outlawed by the high shipping rate, and the produce itself is rotting at the docks. Millions of dollars worth of agricultural products are now waiting for ships to take them to the European markets; but you gentlemen will not vote to bring relief to our own people, but you are voting just as the Ship Trust now robbing our people want you to vote.

Mr. Speaker, these same Republicans who tried to drive the President into war with Mexico in order to protect in Mexico the property of certain interests in this country, and when they failed denounced him as a man who stood for peace at any price, are now expressing fear that he will involve us in war. Their disgusting, quick, and sudden change of front reminds me of the old fellow who went to Texas. He wrote back to his brother, and said: "Dear Bill, if you haven't started to Texas, don't, for this is the most hellacious climate in the world. [Laughter.] Yisterday, while driving a yoke of steers across the prairie, one of them had a sunstroke, and while I was a skinnin' him the other one froze to death." [Laughter and applause.]

Let me say to you, gentlemen, that we will meet you on this issue before the American people, and then you will have an opportunity to explain why you opposed a measure—an emergency measure—to grant them relief from the organized pirates of the sea. [Applause.]

We will call upon you to explain why you opposed a shipping bill that would greatly reduce the shipping rate on American produce and to tell the people why you were willing for a foreign shipping trust to rob our own people, already distressed on account of the war.

Mr. Speaker, here is an opportunity to build up our foreign trade, to get trade that we have never had, but the Republicans are not willing to lose an opportunity to fight a Democratic administration in its efforts to benefit the American people and serve the country. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I have here a telegram from an American consul in Italy, which says:

> Italy needs 1,000,000 tons American coal, 300,000 tons steel, hundreds of thousands tons American goods. Beg Government furnish ships. America can get entire trade permanently.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

This message comes to us from the people across the seas, and yet gentlemen stand here and oppose our great President in his efforts to provide speedy means for carrying American produce to the markets of the world. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I want to say to gentlemen on that side that the idea in the Weeks bill is not of Republican origin. It is of Democratic origin. Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas more than a year before Mr. WEEKS introduced his bill embodied this idea in a bill that he introduced in this House and it is of Democratic origin. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

You Republicans do not want American produce to leave the docks and reach the markets. You do not want business to improve and prosperity to return. You know that this measure will improve business and restore prosperity in a large degree, and you do not want prosperity before the next election.

You had rather be returned to power than to see labor employed, business good, and the country blossom as the rose. [Applause.] But, gentlemen, we are going to provide for sending the products of our farms and factories to Europe. We will see to it that our produce goes abroad. More men here will be employed, money will come into our country, prosperity will come, and you will go. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS].

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of the Weeks bill as it is before this House now. The Democratic Party have permitted it to lie in committee for months, yet now give swift notice that they are in favor of that bill, but strangely enough they would enact only to postpone its action for two years. If it is a good thing, why not put it in operation? I have tried with all my heart to understand the arguments on both sides in this discussion, and when I listened to the admirable speech of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB] I was charmed and delighted, and I said to myself if what he says is true this bill ought to go through, but when I listened to the other side and found gentlemen whom I believe quite as honest and I believe somewhat more intelligent upon the subject [laughter], that threw me into doubt again.

If the Democrats of this House, Mr. Speaker, would only do as the great Progressive Party, as represented on this floor, has done [laughter], they would depend upon their own judgment. Men who weigh and consider, as the Progressives do, are divided upon this important proposition. [Laughter.] But we find the Democrats all of one mind. I have heard reasons given for this unanimity that are not complimentary to their personal independence, but let us not go into that. I am in favor of Government ownership [applause] for the purpose of maintaining regulatory rates on the high seas. I do not fear the socialistic idea. Any person who has studied our public-road system, our public-school system, our Postal System, and municipal ownership are no longer scared at this bugaboo of socialism. I believe that certain conditions may arise, such as have been referred to at length on the floor, when it becomes the duty of the organized powers of society to take hold and regulate such conditions in the interest of the public welfare, when private initiative is unequal to the task; and I would be in favor of this bill if it were Government ownership and a fair experiment of governmental operation and control; but this bill, as I study it, as I see it, means nothing of the sort. It is not proposed here seriously that the Government shall operate these lines. It is carefully arranged that these lines of ships may be leased. Who is going to lease and operate these ships? Is it not most likely it will be by men who are already in the shipping business? Will not the great Shipping Trust, if it exists, as I believe it does—will not they see to it that their agents get those leases, and will not they operate them in such a way, notwithstanding the power of the Government to fix regulatory rates, but still operate them in such a way as that it will not interfere much with their monopoly, by delays and lack of facilities driving the shippers away from patronizing the Government-owned ships? Of course this would cost the trust some money, but would not much disturb its control of rates. I do not fear, Mr. Speaker, this idea of war very much. I think the danger of foreign entanglements is overdrawn. I have got the notion that it would serve American interests better if we took a bolder stand upon American rights than we have been taking, for my idea is that Germany, Austria, France, and England have all the war they want and will not have appetite for any more of it in the near future. So, while I do not regard the Government ownership of merchant ships of great hazard, my opposition to this bill is because it will not give the Government control of rates nor the public relief from the extortions of the Shipping Trust.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Speaker, these are degenerate and evil days we are drifting into in one of the greatest legislative bodies in the world. It is humiliating to acknowledge it. Within four days after we have dedicated a monument to the memory of the greatest American commoner, Abraham Lincoln, we have to confess that this Government has become for the time being a Government of the White House, by the White House, and for the White House.

Let us see ourselves as others see us and see if the photograph will not be recognized. Take the headlines in the daily press as to what is happening in this body and what, let us ask, has become of the legislative prerogatives of the great representative department in the legislation of the Government? The headlines in the Star of last Friday afternoon are these:

Wilson rejects Gore ship bill—Refuses to agree to amendment limiting activities of United States in shipping business.

The headlines in the Washington Post of the next—Saturday—morning:

Ship fight in House—Administration hopes to force passage by gag rule.

Read the headlines in the Times of last evening:

Crack party whip to jam ship bill through the House.

These are not the heated arguments of partisans in debate. They are the ordinary news indications of what is happening in the House of Representatives, and honest news gatherers could not describe the degeneracy into which this legislative body has descended with accuracy without using phraseology something like this.

By the same token, under orders from the Legislative Mansion—with proper acknowledgments to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]—you gentlemen could put through the House with the same vote you had in the caucus last night, which is supposed to be 154, and probably would proceed to do so as heartily, a repeal of the Ten Commandments, of the Apostles' Creed, or the Sermon on the Mount. And you could do it by the caucus methods you have adopted for Democratic legislation.

This is one of the biggest pieces of political junk and undigested, un-American socialism that was ever skidded through the House of Representatives. [Applause on the Republican side.] There is not 10 per cent of the membership of this body that believes in the principles of this bill or the provisions that you are supposed to enact into this legislation.

We have heard you talk in the lobbies of the hotels, about the tables in the dining rooms, and on the streets, as we have conversed together, and it is not betraying any friendly secrets to make the estimate that probably there is not 20 per cent of the membership on either side of this Chamber that believes heartily in this measure. And if any of you Democrats who are instructed to pass it should find this bill rising up and embarrassing you in the next campaign I am one of the friends you can call upon to prove an alibi. Your heart is not in this legislation. It is not your bill. As the Speaker is reported to have said to you in the secret caucus last night, the President wants it. If you do not pass it you will have an extra session, and he has prophesied what disaster that would mean to the Democratic Party. The schoolmaster has announced that you Democratic schoolboys will have no recess and will be kept in after school if you do not perform the stunt that is laid out for you, and you are performing under the smart of the ruler of the master and under the threat of the hickory switch. The wholé nomenclature of legislation in the Congress of the United States has had to undergo a change in order to adapt itself to present methods of legislation. It is a minority government that we are living under, from the White House, through the House of Representatives, and on through the Senate. If correctly reported, last night 154 Members of this body decided what shall be the destiny of this legislation in the House of 435 Members.

After the last census was taken, believing in a representative Government and in order to have a better representation of the real sentiment of all parts of this Republic, now numbering about 100,000,000 in population, we enlarged the representation of this body up to 435 Members. And yet if you are to legislate by instructions from the White House and then tie up and gag your own membership by a bare majority in a secret caucus, I suggest, in the interest of economy in this administration, which is confessedly confronted with an enormous financial deficit, there is no just reason why Congress should not take a vacation without pay, at least until the termination of the present administration. One good office boy with a couple of rubber stamps could perform the perfunctory duties that are expected to be discharged in these two Houses of Congress. [Applause on the Republican side.] It would be an enormous saving to the country.

We do not perform legislative functions upon administrative measures in this body any longer by a combat of intellectual powers and in honest debate. If the cloture rule can be established in the other end of the Capitol, which the evening papers announce the President in his confidential interviews with the members of the press this morning announced he was in favor of, there is no reason why, so far as administrative measures are concerned, you can not hereafter adopt them while you wait. Football legislation, legislation by main strength, legislation by the use of the hollow square, the flying "V," and the athletic wedge, and team work. You have a captain of the team. What will become of you if you still have some vestige of your own independence left and decline to play the game you will find set forth in the Indianapolis speech, which has become the new handbook of a declining Democracy. Here it is:

If any group of men should dare to break the solidarity of the Democratic team for any purpose or from any motive, theirs will be a most unenviable notoriety and a responsibility which will bring deep bitterness to them.

Whether you are to be actually beheaded or are only to suffer political execution does not clearly appear. You have a captain who expects to hold you to account.

We hear a good deal about pernicious lobbying. The most pernicious lobby is the official lobby. Cabinet officers cease to be active heads of great executive departments and become lecturers before commercial clubs and social teas—lobbying for administration measures.

Autocracy is not Democracy; it is government by dictation, instead of government by representatives of the people. One-man government is as bad now as in the middle of the Dark Ages. It can never be justified, except by the tenet of superstition and ignorance, "The King can do no wrong."

Now, as to the merits of this bill. It is claimed it is an emergency measure. No emergency exists that this bill will meet. The exportations from the United States in the month of January were the largest exportations to foreign countries in any single month in the history of the United States. It was an abnormal export, and it was an export demanded by the war, and consisted largely of munitions of war and of foodstuffs. We have exported them and there must have been ships to take them. They could not get across by aeroplanes. The ships were here to take them across. The greatest exportations were during the month of January, and they are continuing during the present month. We could not, with Government-owned ships, export those things now if we wanted to do so. Munitions of war are made contraband by Germany. No American bottom can take them out on the ocean without being liable to confiscation. A dispatch from London this afternoon, published in the evening papers, dated at 4.46 p. m., states that Great Britain will announce officially this evening or to-morrow morning that foodstuffs hereafter shipped to Germany will be considered contraband of war. That absolutely removes all possibilities for this bill. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. Speaker, I feel that I would be recreant to my trust as a representative of the great city of New York if I did not rise in my place in opposition to this measure. You have listened to-day to the remarks of my colleague, Mr. METZ, who favors its passage. He is one of the largest manufacturers of dyestuffs in the city of New York and knows much of the difficulties confronting the Nation in the matter of over-sea transportation. He is one of our best citizens and a man who deserves much from the people of his city and State. He is a large importer from Europe and, like many others in his line, has been seriously inconvenienced as a result of the European war.

Mr. METZ. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York yield to his colleague?

Mr. CALDER. Mr. Speaker, I will not yield now. I will yield later.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. CALDER. I will yield to the gentleman in a moment.

Mr. Speaker, I have here resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York at a meeting held recently. This organization is composed of the leading merchants, importers, exporters, manufacturers, and business men of our State, and they protest against the enactment of this legislation. The president of this organization, the Hon. Seth Low, is a former mayor of New York City. I also have resolutions adopted by the Manufacturers and Business Men's Association of New York opposing this bill.

What is it we propose to gain by the enactment of this measure? Shall we add to the visible tonnage by a single ship? And if so, where do we expect to obtain these vessels? It is not proposed in this measure that we shall enter into contracts to build merchant vessels, but are to purchase ships already in existence. This will not relieve the situation, for the ships that we purchase are at present engaged in carrying freight. Is it intended that we shall purchase the German and Austrian ships now interned in our harbors? There are 66 of these vessels with a total of 518,706 tons gross, and most of them are of the passenger-carrying class. It has been maintained in some quarters that if this bill passes it is not the intention of the Government to buy these interned vessels, and I sincerely trust such is the case. It would be taking an unusual risk in view of the attitude of all of the belligerents on this question. It has been repeated over and over again to-day that the rules of the London convention, to which all of the belligerents subscribe, plainly indicate that they would consider a ship sold subsequent to the war subject to capture if overtaken on the high seas. If these German and Austrian vessels are to be considered, would it not be much better to permit their purchase by individuals? Private capital will be very glad to take them and operate them if they can be placed under our flag without the opposition of the warring powers. If purchased and operated by the Government, there is a possibility of our being involved in grave difficulties. If one of these ships owned by a private individual was to be captured or destroyed, the matter would be one for settlement by the rules of war, and our Government could not be directly involved; but if owned by this Government and captured or destroyed we would be immediately involved, and there is grave probability that it would end in serious complications that might be most disastrous to the peace of this country.

Mr. Speaker, much has been said to-day about the excessive freight rates charged in our over-sea trade. Everyone knows that the rates are higher than ever before and that they are really more than they should be. I am reliably informed that on vessels owned by citizens of Great Britain and France that the freight rates are little higher than under normal conditions prevailing before the war. This is a natural situation. A vessel sailing under the flag of any of the belligerents is subject to capture with all they contain, while ships sailing under a neutral flag are safe, but these unusual rates on neutral ships are to be expected. Many of the English and French merchantmen are being used in connection with their army and navy, and all are subject to capture if encountered by the enemy; so there is every good reason under these circumstances why rates attain their unusual high mark.

But, gentlemen, practically all the great maritime nations of the world except our own are at war. Conditions are extraordinary, and when one stops to consider all of the facts, have we much to complain of? I have heard on the floor to-day of the difficulties that the farmers of the West and South are faced with. We are told of the extraordinary prices charged the grower of wheat and corn for shipping his product. I am advised that these excessive rates are paid by the consumer and that the farmer is receiving an unusually high price. In my city and State an investigation is under way because of the shortage of wheat and the high price of flour. It is maintained that a combination of wheat growers and those interested in the great exchanges of the country are responsible for this condition of affairs. It seems to me that the European war is responsible. The other countries are unable to raise enough to supply their needs, and, naturally, they come to us, the great food-producing nation, to feed them. It has been suggested that it might be well to stop the exportation of foodstuffs, and thereby reduce the freight rates and, incidentally, the cost to the American consumer.

Now I will yield to my colleague, Mr. METZ, for a question. I promised him that I would.

Mr. METZ. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman asked me a question, and I am going to make an explanation.

Mr. CALDER. My time is very short. I can only yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. METZ. How many ships do you suppose the business I am engaged in needs for the transportation of its products to this country?

Mr. CALDER. I should say one ship a month.

Mr. METZ. Five thousand tons will do the whole thing and keep the woolen mills in operation.

Mr. CALDER. I have no desire to intimate that the gentleman is supporting this measure because of any personal interest he may have. I know him too well to believe that he is actuated in this or other matters by his personal interests. I sincerely trust that whatever business he has abroad will go on without serious inconvenience.

Mr. METZ. The gentleman need not worry about me.

Mr. CALDER. I know that my colleague is able to take care of himself.

Mr. Speaker, this is a most unusual proceeding. To-day we are discussing a great measure, establishing a new policy for the Government without reasonable consideration. This bill is to be debated for six hours. It ought to have at least two weeks. Hardly a man on this floor knows the contents of the measure we are asked to vote upon to-day. A careful reading would indicate to me that we will repeal all our navigation laws by passing this bill—measures enacted during all the years of the existence of this country safeguarding the lives and property of the people on the high seas. If for no other reason I would vote against this bill. Having assisted in preparing some of these important navigation laws, I am not willing to vote to repeal them without some knowledge as to what will be substituted in their place and without an opportunity for reasonable debate. There are many other provisions in this bill which should be discussed and open for amendment, and to which careful and deliberate consideration should be given. The bill is brought in here under a special rule as the result of caucus dictation and will be voted upon exactly as reported, without any opportunity for amendment. There is no demand for this legislation. The business men throughout the country realize that if this bill is enacted into law it will simply mean the expenditure of $40,000,000 of the people's money without appreciable relief to the world's commerce. Yesterday I inquired from the Commissioner of Navigation the amount of tonnage of all the maritime nations, and will print as part of my remarks the number of ships of each nation and their tonnage. This statement indicates that all the gross tonnage of the maritime nations of the earth in 1914 amounted to approximately 50,000,000 tons, and of that amount the tonnage of Austria and Germany amounted to 6,500,000 tons, about one-eighth of the total. The effect of the withdrawal of these two countries from trade has, of course, seriously inconvenienced business.

The operation of steamship lines by the Government is a new departure in this country. It is true that this was undertaken in a limited extent when we took over the Panama line of steamers at the time of the purchase of the rights of the French interests which had the canal under construction. We were compelled to use them for the purpose of carrying supplies necessary in the building of the canal. I venture the statement that a careful examination of the cost of operation will prove that it has been a losing venture as against privately owned and operated steamship lines. One of the important planks in the socialistic platform of 1912 provides for "the collective ownership of railroads, telegraphs, telephones, steamship lines, and all other means of social transportation and communication, and all land." Has the Democratic Party in this House committed itself finally to the doctrine of socialism? Is this one of the new ideas that President Wilson has criticized the Republican Party for not having? Is this to be the beginning of a movement whereby this Government shall operate the railroads, telegraphs, telephones, and other means of transportation?

Gentlemen speak of this measure as a temporary one, but they do not attempt to advise us where they are going to get the vessels to operate. It seems to me rather, Mr. Speaker, that we are entering upon a new field of activity. The experiences of the last 20 years have shown us that when we undertake things of this kind we are adding unnecessary expense to the conduct of the business of the Nation, which results in an excessive burden on the people.

I voted for the Alaskan railroad bill although I hesitated in so doing. My reason for voting for it was because it was a new country which contained Government land of great value, that we sorely needed the coal that it is claimed exists there, and we were advised private capital would not invest in an enterprise of this character. I am informed that the appropriation authorized in this year's sundry civil bill is to be used in the purchase of an existing railroad. I have sufficient confidence in the Secretary of the Interior to be sure that he will obtain a good bargain for the Government, but I am satisfied now that I erred when I voted for the measure. When the European war is over, if this bill is passed, the Government merchant ships will be brought in direct competition not only with American privately owned vessels but merchant ships of all the nations of the world. Does anyone believe that with the higher wages and better living conditions required on Government-owned American ships we can hope to compete at a profit? Either we will be compelled to conduct our shipping business at a loss or lay our vessels up. What method shall we pursue to build up our much-needed merchant marine?

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, there is only one of two things to do. First, to give to foreign-built vessels the permanent right to come in under the American flag, to operate in both the over-sea and coastwise trade under the same conditions as now afforded our own ships, or, second, to follow the policy of Great Britain in granting a subsidy to their mail and merchant lines. I am heartily in favor of the latter. I believe that if we should devote the interest on the $40,000,000 contemplated in this measure to give Government aid to privately owned lines of vessels we would encourage the building of a merchant marine that would in the end in a large degree take care of at least our South American commerce. Those of us on this side believe in protection to American industries, and in your own Underwood tariff bill, while it is a nonrevenue-producing measure as compared with the Republican system of a protective tariff, nevertheless, in many of its provisions you have sought to take care of special interests, to protect them against foreign competition. The same principle is involved in the building of the merchant marine. We can not hope to succeed until we follow the policy of Government aid.

I have been a Member of this House for 10 years. I had hoped that I might aid in doing something to establish a merchant marine. I can not vote for this measure. It is socialistic. It is apt to involve us in serious trouble with the Governments of Europe now engaged in war with each other and will not appreciably contribute to the relief of the present trying situation. It will be unprofitable from the standpoint of the Government, and will be, I am convinced, a failure.

My attention was called this morning to a speech delivered by President Wilson about three years ago. I believe it was in the spring before his nomination for the Presidency. It occurred at Indianapolis, where he delivered another speech recently, and the meeting was presided over by the then governor, now Vice President Marshall. In the former speech Gov. Wilson spoke with unusual vigor and with compelling force. First, he insisted that all legislation should be conducted under the public eye; that committees should transact their business with wide-open doors; that the public should be freely admitted at all times to hear and see what might transpire in the course of legislation. And yet our history furnishes no parallel to the secrecy that shrouded the preparation of this bill. Upon this measure no hearings have been held in the House. It was formulated behind closed doors and almost wholly in the dark and without one note of protest coming from the White House. Secondly, he inveighed most vigorously against the party caucus in this same speech at Indianapolis and took the position that all the representatives of the people, in both House and Senate, should have the full privilege of debate and amendment and that the individual conscience should never be bound by caucus domination. Imagine it, gentlemen! He was a candidate then. How things have changed since that day. It seems to me that never in any period of the history of the United States has any great party been so dominated by caucus rule. In the main every great measure which we have considered during the present Congress was formulated behind closed doors, out of view of the public and the minority of this House. The Democratic side has voted at all times its caucus determination, no matter whether or not our view was the correct one. As an evidence of this, take the Federal currency act, which came to the House as a result of caucus. It was amended in one or two small particulars, and went to the Senate with the assurance that it was a perfect measure, meeting the hearty approval of the President, but before it got through the Senate it was amended six hundred times. The President's third preelection statement was that each of the three coordinate branches of government should be absolutely independent of the other two; that the Executive should never encroach upon or invade the sphere of the others, and that neither should ever tolerate any interference whatever by either of the other two. And yet, neither Jackson, whom the President said in his recent speech he was following, nor Roosevelt, at whom three years ago he was striking, ever interfered more with legislation and its passage than the President has done in this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I have discussed this measure with many gentlemen on the other side of the House. They are opposed to it in their hearts. They doubt its value. Many of them are confident that it is a step in the dark and one that in the end will be a failure, and still they vote for it because of the pressure from the White House.

The business men of the great city of New York, which I have the honor in part to represent, are almost to a man against this measure. They are much better informed on the subject than are we. They know the intricacies of trade and are unlike the President, who in his last Indianapolis speech stated that he had never been in business and therefore could not be prejudiced in the matter.

We are living in difficult times. We are at peace with the world. Let us do nothing that will mar this peace.

I am in receipt of a letter from the Commissioner of the Bureau of Navigation, dated February 15, advising me that on June 30, 1914, there was employed in the coasting trade of the United States 23,562 vessels, of 6,818,363 gross tons.

Mr. Speaker, I shall print here a statement of Lloyds, the great English authority on the merchant marine, indicating the number of vessels engaged in the world's commerce, with their gross and net tonnage.

Number and net and gross tonnage of steam and sailing vessels of over 100 tons, of the several countries of the world, as recorded in Lloyd's Register for 1914–15.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman from Missouri going to occupy all of his time for one speech? If not, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, when I think of the record made by this Congress, a Congress pledged to the enactment of legislation to lighten the burdens of the people, I do not know whether to laugh or to cry. You enacted a tariff law that made the high cost of living higher to the consumer. You passed a currency law that increased interest rates to the borrower. Your proverbial economy in expenditures has become the most profligate extravagance in administration of the country ever witnessed. No wonder our people are staggering under the burdens of taxation. Business is stagnant. Industry is paralyzed. You seem to recognize that the patient is sick, but you do not seem to have sense enough to prescribe the remedy. You have the captain of the team, as the President calls himself, and you seem to think that legislating for 100,000,000 of your countrymen is mere boys' play.

We are told that we have no ships, and that this is the reason for this measure; yet during the month of December, 1913, we sent abroad of our corn, our wheat, our oats, and our barley only 5,000,000 bushels. In December, 1914, we sent abroad over 41,000,000 bushels of these cereals. Apparently we have no difficulty in securing an abundance of ships to carry our produce abroad.

But some one says that ocean rates are high. I would be very glad to vote for a bill to bring about a reduction in those rates. How about that side of the Chamber, whose party in convention in Baltimore adopted a platform promising cheaper railway rates? In the Interstate Commerce case where the eastern roads were asking for an increase of 5 per cent, the president of the New York Central lines testified that in 1913 that after setting aside all that was necessary for depreciation, and after setting aside $11,000,000 to the surplus fund, they still had enough to pay 11 per cent on the entire capitalization of the road. The president of the Pennsylvania Railroad testified that in 1913, after setting aside a sufficient fund to cover all of the depreciation charges they still had net earnings sufficient to pay more than 9.6 per cent on the total capitalization of the Pennsylvania Railroad. Yet, notwithstanding such magnificent earnings, the President of the United States, on September 11 wrote a letter which appears in the New York Times of that date under the following headlines:

President asks aid for railroads—Calls country's attention to the necessity of giving them every possible help—Finds their needs vital—In open letter to Frank Trumbull he insists their credits must be sustained—May seek rate increase—Reopening of interstate ruling of August 1 probably will be asked by eastern lines.

The President says to Mr. Trumbull:

Since you read it to me yesterday I have read again the statement you made on behalf of the committee of railroad presidents whom I had the pleasure of meeting and conferring with at my office. It is a lucid statement of plain truths.

You asked me to call the attention of the country to the imperative need that railway credits be sustained and the railroads helped in every possible way, whether by private cooperative effort or by the action, wherever feasible, of Government agencies, and I am glad to do so, because I think the need very real. * * *

I am confident that there will be active and earnest cooperation in this matter, perhaps the one common interest of our whole industrial life * * *.

Cordially and sincerely, yours, WOODROW WILSON.

Active cooperation! Active cooperation with whom? With whom could the President cooperate? Who had the power to grant the increase? The Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Interstate Commerce Commission alone. The President wanted freight rates increased for railroads that were earning 11 per cent in 1913 after they had paid all operating expenses, charged off all that was necessary for depreciation, and set aside $11,000,000 for the surplus fund. And yet you gentlemen on that side now claim that you are in favor of bearing down on the trusts and putting them out of business and of bringing lower freight rates to the country. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But gentlemen say, "Oh, we would put the Ship Trust out of business. How about the Ship Trust?" Are you anxious to put it out of business? If so, you have the power through the Attorney General. In a previous Congress I voted against a ship subsidy. I will vote against it again. But before I would vote for this bill I would willingly vote for a ship subsidy. With such a law we would know what it would cost the country. Then I would know that I was voting for the Shipping Trust and would admit it. But with this bill enacted into law, who can say what the cost to the Government will be? You gentlemen talk about a Ship Trust, when you know, if you have read the report of the Attorney General, that the only Ship Trust he can find that is engaged in commerce is the German-American Packet Co., and that is one of the companies that you intend to help by buying their interned ships. They can not use these ships; we should not; but you propose to help this trust out of a very tight place by buying their interned ships. [Applause on the Republican side.] In the light of the testimony of the Attorney General, may I ask who is in favor of or is helping the greatest Shipping Trust in the world? [Applause on the Republican side.] Yes; I should like to see some law enacted that would reduce the rates on ocean freights. I would vote for a bill to-day to build ships auxiliary to our Navy. I would vote for a bill to-day to put to work a few out of millions of my countrymen who are out of work. I would gladly vote to set them to building ships, instead of buying interned ships, as you propose to do. [Applause on the Republican side.]

But you say this is an emergency measure. We have a law, enacted by Congress a few years ago, that not a dollar can be paid out of the Treasury unless it is appropriated in specific terms.

If you will turn to section 7 of this bill, you will find that the $30,000,000 is not appropriated. Not a penny of that $30,000,000 is appropriated, but you have done a most unusual thing—a thing that Congress should never do. You have authorized the Secretary of the Treasury not only to sell Government bonds to buy or build ships but, by this provision, you authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to trade the bonds of your country and mine—Panama bonds of the value of $30,000,000—for old ships. He is to be the judge of the value of the old ships traded for and the price at which the bonds are to be accepted. Ordinarily you would offer these bonds to the public and sell them to the highest bidder; not so in this bill. You are proposing now that the Secretary of the Treasury may exchange these bonds for ships. You may have a very high and exalted opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury; but I submit that our American crown prince, the Secretary of the Treasury, should not be permitted to trade our Government bonds in this way for any merchandise.

No; let us refuse this un-American request; let us do what was finally determined by the Committee on Naval Affairs to do; let us build these ships. It was determined by that committee, after full hearing, that after the lapse of seven or eight months there could be one ship produced of from 8,000 to 10,000 tons capacity, and that thereafter two ships could be turned out every month by American labor. You say this is an emergency measure, and you also say the Secretary of the Treasury will trade the Panama Government bonds for old ships. Then you must admit that there will be no funds authorized with which he can purchase ships except the $10,000,000 appropriated in section 15 of this bill. If such an emergency exists, why wait until after the next Congress convenes in December before appropriating this $30,000,000? If an emergency exists satisfy it now by adequate appropriation; if an emergency does not exist, then let us drop the consideration of a measure that may involve us in international difficulties.

Mr. Speaker, $40,000,000 may not be a large amount of money. The way that side of the House has appropriated money, it does not so regard it; but, Mr. Speaker, $40,000,000 is too much money for us to pay for an international quarrel. [Applause on the Republican side.]

It is not the expenditure of money alone of which I complain, but it is the great risk that we take in buying these interned ships. Let us understand that if we are to become involved in war with any European powers it will be because we have rushed headlong into the shipping business at a time when prudence and common sense would dictate to us that we should attend to our own business. This is not the time to embark in this industry.

The Democratic mayor of New York has called the President's attention to the fact that the wheat supply of this country is becoming exhausted and that the price of bread in this country is becoming a problem, but even that does not seem to prevent gentlemen on that side from rushing blindly into this program to buy these ships from the only Shipping Trust that exists in all the world and give them Panama bonds in payment for them. I shall vote against the bill. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN].

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much the limited time granted for debate. I have noticed before the six hours expired the remarkable effect of the debate. When this debate opened on this side there was a strenuous charge that the bill was not a House of Representatives bill, but that it was a bill originating in the Executive Mansion. No sooner was the charge made than the denial came from the Democratic side. Within the last hour of the debate so much progress was made that in Addisonian prose the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] arose and boastfully said that this bill is a President Wilson bill. And, as if to clinch the admission, our able poetic friend from Connecticut arose and in his piquant rhymes and near poetry boasted this bill to be the bill of President Wilson.

So that the debate has established that one fact. I have considerable faith in the knowledge of the man who produced that bill; and when I heard within the last few days mooted about the Capitol the charge that the Shipping Trust was the obstruction to the passage of this bill, I submitted a question to the Department of Justice, officered by the appointees of the President of the United States, asking that department what actions had been begun against the so-called Shipping Trust, how far the actions had proceeded, and how many convictions there had been, and this is the answer:

Referring to your letter of the 10th instant, three cases under the Federal antitrust law have been instituted in the southern district of New York against alleged combinations of ocean steamship lines, in none of which was the Government successful in the lower courts.

The Department of Justice saw fit to begin these cases. They were tried before the courts of the United States by the best talent this administration could present, and he makes the statement that he was unable to obtain convictions in any of the cases he had selected for prosecution. He goes on to add that he will take the cases to the Supreme Court.

The case against the Hamburg-American Line and others, decided October 13, 1914, is now pending on appeal in the Supreme Court; and the cases against the American-Asiatic Steamship Co. and others and the Prince Line (Ltd.) and others, both decided February 3, 1915, will be appealed to the Supreme Court.

The admission by the Department of Justice that the existing cases selected by it have thus far failed; and the charge that is made so promiscuously from the other side of the House has no foundation whatever, so far as the present is concerned. No man with confidence in the Department of Justice and the courts of this land will make the charge until they have succeeded in establishing a conviction.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman yield.

Mr. SLOAN. I can not yield. I want to say that I object to this bill because I believe it an indirect and objectionable declaration of war. The White House induced the Members of this House last spring to make a declaration of war, not against a great nation, but against an individual. Then was projected our fleet against an officer of another Government. It captured the greatest port of that nation, drove out the head of the only part of that nation where American life, limb, and property were safe and left anarchy throughout the Republic of Mexico, overrun by the outlaw followers of unstable Carranza, the bloodthirsty Zapata, and the villainous Villa.

We have been furnished from the same source heretofore a great many ships, but they are all hardships. [Laughter.] They have fallen upon our National Treasury, upon our laborers, and upon our industries. Plenty hardships have been furnished us, and we do not want any ships of commerce forced upon us from the same source.

In nearly every speech I have heard to-day on that side there were crocodile tears shed for the producers of the land and the farmers who desired to send their products abroad. The bill which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS] said was substantially the same bill as the one now being considered on page 2 says that the purpose of the bill is to stimulate shipping between the ports of the United States and South and Central America. What does that mean to the American farmer? It means that every ship that goes from the American ports to South America will carry back—what? Not manufactured articles; but they will carry back grain, corn, wheat, alfalfa, beef and other meat, as they have been during the last year, in great cargoes from Argentina. In the report I find here in support of the Alexander bill a statement that there were 16,000,000 bushels of corn came in last year.

It was said that was only a negligible quantity, and yet, according to the evidence submitted before the Committee on Agriculture in the grain-grading hearings, and uncontradicted, although 50 grain dealers were there, it reduced the price of our corn to our producers at least 10 cents a bushel. Every man who knows anything about grain knows that to be absolutely true, and the farmers of the United States are not interested in having first placed upon the free list the products of the farm, and then to put our hands into the Treasury of the United States, or rather strain the credit of the United States, to buy ships to haul grain from South America to the American ports and there compete directly with the products of our farms. We lost in revenue enough on those 16,000,000 bushels of corn to have kept our Treasury going for three days, and that would have been a fine breathing spell both for the Treasury and for you in these times. The party which has spurned the farmer and scorned the farmer in all its legislation will not gain much favor in prescribing this specious and dangerous measure. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN.] [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the pending bill, because, first, it is not needed, and, second, it is dangerous. It is said that freight rates on the ocean are too high and that the Shipping Trust controls the vessels. If the Shipping Trust controls the vessels, from whom will we buy our vessels? From the Shipping Trust? If the Shipping Trust are making the enormous profits out of freight rates to-day, why should they sell their vessels to the Government of the United States or the shipping board? If, as was said by one gentleman here, a vessel is making its cost out of its rates in a year, at what price will they sell that vessel? I have waited in vain to-day for any answer to these questions. Who will sell the vessels to the United States? Is it proposed to expend $30,000,000 in buying vessels from the Shipping Trust and take those vessels which the Shipping Trust will give up? It certainly must be plain that if a trust controls the freight rates on the ocean and controls the vessels, there will be no vessels for us to buy, unless we are willing to pay exorbitant prices for old ships which are practically old hulks. [Applause on the Republican side.] How, then, will the passage of this bill reduce freight rates? Under the terms of this bill you can not build any vessels to meet the emergency which you say now exists, because that will take time, and before the ships can be constructed this emergency will have passed away. It is said that we can not send our produce abroad rapidly enough.

If all of the wheat in the United States to-day, or four-fifths of it, or one-half of it, could to-day be put on the Atlantic on its way to Europe, the price of wheat would have the bottom drop out of it. If we send our wheat abroad too rapidly, it will put the price of wheat down so that we will not get as much for all of the wheat as we would if one-half of it is sent more slowly. [Applause.] And if to-day we could send abroad all of the cotton that lies in the ports of the country, the price of cotton would break, and you would not get 5 cents a pound for it abroad. You maintain the price of these products abroad largely because there has been and is some delay in endeavoring to ship abroad at the present high prices. Otherwise, you would break the price.

Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the bill because it is dangerous. You can not buy the vessels from the Shipping Trust unless you pay enormous prices, and is it proposed, then, to buy the interned vessels of belligerent nations? Everyone knows that the moment we buy one of the interned vessels and load upon that vessel foodstuffs which England has declared to be conditional contraband and which she will not permit to be sent to Germany, we are treading upon dangerous ground. I believe that the President of the United States is sincere in his desire to preserve the absolute neutrality of this country as between the warring nations. In that respect I stand with him and behind him. I want to keep this country out of war [applause] and out of provocation for war. Of course, if we reach the point where we must fight for our rights, we will all do it with enthusiasm, but we do not wish to reach that point.

In this fight between the allies and Germany and Austria we know that in the end these nations, in a desperate struggle for existence, will not be too careful in their treatment of the rights of neutrals. We should make every effort to keep out of trouble, to keep our nose out of the affairs of other people. [Applause.] We should set ourselves absolutely against any kind of alliances or entanglements which may bring us to the point where we may have to vote for or against war. This is the great opportunity of the United States, while these other great powers are warring, to reach preeminence through peace. We must preserve peace, and we ought not under any circumstances to take a step which, whether it actually leads to war or not, leads to difficulties. We can send our foodstuffs, we can send our cotton, abroad as rapidly as they will be taken up at good prices in other countries. We do not need this bill. If we pass it and it is put into operation, we shall run the risk of embroiling our country in foreign difficulties and perhaps in war. Let us remember to be patriots first, and to uphold the rights of our country peaceably, and keep out of trouble. [Applause.]

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose to detain the House at any length. If I were inclined to traverse the ground which gentlemen on the other side have endeavored to cover and to correct the misstatements—the reckless misstatements—made by them, I would require far more time than is at my disposal. I can understand partisan feeling. I am sometimes inspired by it myself, but I have never stooped so low as to be absolutely indifferent to the truth when undertaking to criticize the adversary party. Take it for granted that this bill did originate at the White House. Could it have originated at a better source? [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is possible you gentlemen on the other side do not have that high regard for the gentleman who is now the Chief Magistrate of the United States which is entertained by the gentlemen on this side. But I want to tell you that in lofty patriotism, in scholarship, in statesmanship there is not another man in the United States to-day better or greater than Woodrow Wilson. [Applause on the Democratic side.] But it is not becoming, it is undignified, it is contemptible for you to try to slur him. It is beneath the dignity of any American citizen [applause on the Democratic side], much less the minority in this body, that in times past has represented a great political party in this country. Some of you say you are in favor of Government ownership, but this bill does not go far enough. Some of you are in favor of subsidy, some of you are not.

Gentlemen, is there anything in the situation in this country to-day growing out of the war in Europe to arrest the attention of the American people and demand a remedy? Is there anything in the situation that suggests to you the necessity of an American merchant marine? Have you given any thought to that subject, or have you been so diligent in your criticism of the President of the United States that you have overlooked what to my mind is one of the greatest problems before the American people to-day demanding solution? [Applause on the Democratic side.] I regard an American merchant marine as an essential part of the national defense. It has been my aspiration ever since I came to Congress to be an humble instrument of my party to do something to rehabilitate the American merchant marine. [Applause on the Democratic side.] While my party was in the minority and I was serving on the committee under the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE], I cooperated with him in every rational way to help solve this great problem, but I was unwilling to support such measures as the Humphrey bill, which contemplated the expenditure of about $5,000,000 a year to be paid to about 20 ships belonging to certain favorite ship lines. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MURDOCK. And under a 10-year contract.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman from Illinois, the minority leader, quite in contrast with his associates on that side of the House, says that he believes the President of the United States is intent on maintaining or observing our duty as a neutral Nation; that he will not knowingly do anything that will compromise us as a Nation or involve us in war with one or the other of the belligerents. That is a sentiment worthy of the gentleman from Illinois [applause], but it is in contrast with and a reproach to every gentleman on that side who has spoken to-day in criticism of the President.

Mr. MANN. I represent the sentiment of every gentleman on this side; all of them.

Mr. ALEXANDER. If that is true, if the gentleman from Illinois reflects the true sentiment of the gentlemen on that side of the House, and believes in good faith what he says, what is this talk that we have had to-day about the risk of involving ourselves in war if this bill should become a law? The President of the United States is charged with the administration of this law. No ship can be purchased without his consent. The representatives of all the belligerent nations are here, and before any ship is purchased we can ascertain whether or not they will object to that purchase. But, gentlemen, we have heard much about the duties, our obligations as a neutral. Why, gentlemen, I can not understand why you emphasize our duties, and are seemingly indifferent to our rights.

In years past the Republican Party was wont to point to the splendid flag yonder as an emblem of the greatest and the freest Nation on earth and it was their boast that under its ample folds we should not only observe our obligations but dared assert our rights. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And yet timorous, cowardly you seem to be now, and voicing the sentiment of the Shipping Trust, you do not want us to buy any ships nor to assert any rights we may have, notwithstanding the war in Europe, for which we are not responsible, has paralyzed our commerce. It is possible that there are no ships to be purchased except the interned ships. It is possible if we should buy those ships we might not be permitted to use them in the trade with Europe. That we would be guilty of a violation of any of our duties as a neutral if we should use those vessels in the South American, the South African, or the Far Eastern trade I have never yet heard anyone assert. But assuming that to be true, and assuming that we could not buy them, and that under the provisions of this bill we could do no more than utilize the vessels of the Panama Railroad Co., the Army transports, and such naval auxiliaries as might be used for auxiliary purposes, so much the pity, because then the remedy would be that much adequately less. But it is worthy of an effort on our part to do all we can to relieve the situation, and this administration could not excuse itself to the American people unless it should do all in its power to relieve the American people from the extortionate freight rates of the ships now engaged in the foreign trade. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I can not imagine how you gentlemen can be so indifferent, and if I understand your position, and I undertake to sum it up now, it is that notwithstanding freight rates on cotton, wheat, lumber, and other commodities for export have increased from 500 to 1,100 per cent, you regard the situation with absolute indifference and excuse yourselves upon the ground that the foreigner pays the freight. Gentlemen, I investigated the Shipping Trust by direction of this House. I was engaged in that task for more than two years. I found that there was not a single trade area in the world that was not controlled by the Shipping Trust. I found that within three years prior to 1913 ocean freight rates had increased from 50 to 200 per cent, whereas the costs of operation had not appreciably increased at all. I have here a statement of British lines for a number of years past showing their dividends during that time were from 10 to 100 per cent per annum, and each year they accumulated a large surplus.

And yet you say we should regard this situation with indifference; that it does not call for a remedy. I think it is of the utmost importance to us as a Nation if we would extend our foreign trade that we must have reasonable ocean freight rates in order to do so. We can not rest upon the assumption that the foreigner pays the freight. If that logic is true, the farmer might be indifferent as to the rate upon his goods from the farm to the market in the city. But, gentlemen, as I said, it is not my purpose to extend this discussion. The gentleman from Iowa——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, some time before the gentleman concludes will he yield to a question about one of the amendments?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes; but I would rather not do so just at this point.

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], who, after my friend from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], is one of the fiercest partisans in this House, had much to say in the way of harsh criticism about the provision of this bill that the Government should use $30,000,000 of Panama Canal bonds with which to buy ships.

Now, I have before me a copy of a bill introduced in the Senate of the United States by the senior Senator from Iowa. The bill I hold in my hand was introduced in this House by my good friend from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER]. This bill was referred to my committee, and it reads in part:

That the President is hereby authorized to acquire, by purchase or construction, at a cost not exceeding in the aggregate $30,000,000, vessels which shall be both suitable for naval auxiliaries and for use in foreign commerce. In order to provide a fund for the payment of vessels so to be purchased and the cost of the construction of vessels so to be built and equipped hereunder the President may issue and sell or use any of the bonds of the United States now available in the Treasury of the United States under the act of August 5, 1909, the act of February 4, 1910, and the act of March 2, 1911, relating to the issue of bonds for the construction of the Panama Canal, to an amount not exceeding $30,000,000.

The language in the Towner bill is almost identical with the language in the pending bill, and provides for the purchase of ships by issue of Panama Canal bonds.

Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. The second amendment proposes to strike out of the original bill the word "shall," in line 5, on page 2, and insert the word "to." I think that is an inadvertent mistake. The effect of that would be to pay civilian officers on these ships the pay and allowances of naval officers. I think the gentleman has plenty of time, and I will ask him if he will let me read it?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The language of the bill without the amendment reads:

Such civilians, such officers of the naval auxiliary service, such officers and enlisted men of the Navy, including officers on the retired lists, as the Secretary of the Navy may deem necessary, shall be employed in the business of the said mail line or lines.

I stop there at present. Now, the amendment is to strike out "shall" and insert the word "to," and make it read this way:

Such civilians, such officers of the naval auxiliary service, and such officers and enlisted men of the Navy, including officers on the retired list, as the Secretary of the Navy may deem necessary to be employed in the business of the said mail line or lines, and retired officers of the Navy so employed at sea or on shore shall, in all respects, be held and considered to be in an active duty status, and shall receive the pay and allowances of officers of the active list of the same rank and length of service.

The effect of the amendment would be to pay the civilian officers the pay and allowances of naval officers, whereas the gentleman only means the pay of officers on the retired list put on active duty with the rank and pay of officers on the active list.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The gentleman may be correct.

The gentleman has spoken about the division on this side of the House, and that the majority is being coerced from the White House. Gentlemen, in a few minutes we are going to give you an exhibition of solidarity. If it is the result of coercion from the White House, I hope it will always continue, because under this administration we have had more constructive legislation than at any other time in the last 25 years. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from Missouri concluded?

Mr. ALEXANDER. While that is a mistake to which the gentleman from Illinois has called attention, it can be corrected later. I call for a vote now.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment.

Mr. MANN. What is the amendment?

The SPEAKER. It was reported this morning, but the Clerk will report it again.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 1, line 3, after the word "that," by inserting "with the approval of the President."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 221, noes 98.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] demands tellers and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] demands the yeas and nays. The question is on ordering the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 301, nays, 31, answered "present" 5, not voting 86, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the second amendment.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, that was to strike out the word "shall" and substitute the word "to," was it not?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order. Debate is not in order.

Mr. WEBB. I was asking for information.

The SPEAKER. Yes; on line 5, page 3, strike out the word "shall" and substitute the word "to." The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 212, noes 85.

Mr. MANN. I ask for tellers, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] asks for tellers. Those in favor of taking this vote by tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Sixty-three gentlemen have arisen for tellers—a sufficient number—and the Chair appoints the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to act as tellers.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 159, noes 60.

Mr. MANN. I ask for the yeas and nays, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the second amendment.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 230, nays 100, answered "present" 3, not voting 90, as follows:

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk announced the following additional pairs:

Until further notice:

Mr. CLARK of Florida with Mr. CAMPBELL.

Mr. PATTEN of New York with Mr. WOODRUFF.

Mr. SMALL with Mr. COPLEY.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall of the House listening when his name should have been called?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I was attending an important committee meeting.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not bring himself within the rule.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I should like to have the rule of the House observed which prohibits Members gathering around the desk during a roll call.

The SPEAKER. They were not interfering with the roll call.

Mr. MANN. The rule says they shall not be at the desk.

The SPEAKER. That is true. They were consulting with the Speaker.

Mr. MANN. I can not help that; it was during the roll call.

The SPEAKER. It is all over. It does not make a bit of difference. [Laughter and applause.]

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider—well, I will not.

Mr. SHERLEY. You can not.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the bill add new sections, as follows:

"SEC. 5. That the United States, acting through the shipping board hereinafter created, may subscribe to the capital stock of a corporation of the District of Columbia. Said corporation shall have for its object the purchase, construction, equipment, maintenance, and operation of merchant vessels to meet the requirements of the foreign commerce of the United States"——

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. ALEXANDER. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ALEXANDER. The amendment that is now being read was offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PADGETT] and was read. Is it in order now to read the amendment again except by unanimous consent? It has been read once and considered, and is pending under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the point made by the gentleman from Missouri is well taken.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Then I object to the further reading of it.

Mr. MANN. I ask for a division of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. In what regard?

Mr. MANN. There are 13 sections in the amendment, 13 separate propositions, besides a dozen or so other propositions which are divisible. I only ask for a division of the sections.

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly the gentleman is right. The Clerk will report the first section, so that Members will know what they are voting on.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first subdivision.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the United States, acting through the shipping board hereinafter created, may subscribe to the capital stock of a corporation of the District of Columbia. Said corporation shall have for its object the purchase, construction, equipment, maintenance, and operation of merchant vessels to meet the requirements of the foreign commerce of the United States, or to charter vessels for such purposes, and to make charters or leases of any vessel or vessels owned by such corporation to any other corporation organized under the laws of a State, a majority of the stock being owned by citizens of the United States, firm, or individual citizen or citizens of the United States, to be used for such purposes, and shall have power to carry out said objects and purposes: Provided, That the terms and conditions of such charter parties shall first be approved by the shipping board, the initial capital stock of which corporation shall not be over $10,000,000, of the par value of $100 per share: And provided further, That said corporation shall make no charter or lease of any vessel to any corporation, firm, or individual for a longer period than 12 months, and said corporation shall specify in the charter or lease the rates, charges, and fares to be observed by such corporation, firm, or individual chartering or leasing any such vessel or vessels as a maximum to be charged during the life of such charter or lease, and there shall be contained in said charter or lease a provision terminating the same whenever the charterer or the lessee shall violate any of its provisions. It is hereby made the duty of such corporation to take such steps as may be necessary to terminate any such charter or lease whenever the corporation, firm, or individual, party to such charter or lease, shall violate the provisions of the same.

The members of said shipping board, as incorporators, may for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act, form a corporation of the District of Columbia by making and filing a certificate of incorporation, as provided in subchapter 4 of chapter 18 of an act entitled "An act to establish a code of laws for the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1901.

The corporation so formed, its officers and trustees and stockholders shall possess all the powers conferred and perform all the duties imposed by said subchapter 4, except as the same are by this act limited or qualified.

The powers of said corporation shall be limited to the purposes of this act and to such as are necessarily incident thereto.

Said corporation may sue and be sued in any district court of the United States, and may remove to said courts any cause brought against it in any other court.

Said corporation may require any officer or employee to give security for the faithful performance of his duties.

Persons subscribing to the stock of said company shall pay for the same in full at the time of subscription.

The stock owned by the United States shall be voted by the shipping board or its duly selected representative.

The officers and trustees of said corporation shall be citizens of the United States, but need not be citizens of the District of Columbia. Such officers and trustees shall be subject to removal at any time by vote of a majority of the stock at any meeting thereof.

Said corporation and its capital stock shall, so long as the United States owns a majority of said stock, be free from all public taxes.

At no time shall less than 51 per cent of the stock of said corporation be held by the United States, unless the United States shall dispose of all of its stock.

Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, section 5.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MANN) there were—ayes 171, noes 77.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks for tellers and the gentleman from Virginia demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 223, nays 100, answered "present" 4, not voting 96.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 17, 1915.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come before Thee helpless to meet the needs of our day and hour without Thy help. Show us how helpless we are. We seek that eternal and national freedom that can only find expression in the prayer, Thy will be done. Grant us such an enlarged vision of God's great purpose that in giving ourselves to the world we shall be giving the largest and the best service. Give us that spiritual quality that shall impart tone and uplift to all that we touch. May all our service be acceptable to God, because it is the gift of consecrated souls to their fellow men. We ask for Christ's sake. Amen.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-two Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Secretary will read the Journal of the proceedings of the preceding session.

The Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of February 15, 1915, was read and approved.

FRANKFORD ARSENAL, PHILADELPHIA, PA. (S. DOC. NO. 947).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, suggesting that certain items be included in the sundry civil appropriation bill relating to the Frankford Arsenal, Philadelphia, Pa., which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIMS (S. DOC. NO. 948).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting the findings of fact and conclusions of law filed under the act of January 20, 1885, in the French spoliation claims set out in the annexed findings by the court relating to the sloop Ruby, Ezra King, master, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 5259) to establish one or more United States Navy mail lines between the United States and South America and between the United States and the countries of Europe with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a petition of the municipal council of Babatngeg, Province of Leyte, P. I., praying for the passage of the so-called Jones bill, to confer self-government upon the Filipino people, which was referred to the Committee on the Philippines.

Mr. OLIVER. I have a telegram from William M. Randolph, of the Pittsburgh branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD, without reading, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PITTSBURGH, PA., February 16, 1915.

Hon. GEORGE T. OLIVER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The Pittsburgh branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, expressing the sentiment of the colored people of Pennsylvania, most emphatically registers its protest against the striking out of Howard University money from appropriation bill now in Senate Appropriation Committee. Our association appeals to you as a member of said committe to use your influence and exert every possible effort to have said money restored to the appropriation bill.

WM. M. RANDOLPH,
President Pittsburgh Branch National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Mr. SIMMONS. I present a joint resolution of the Legislature of North Carolina, favoring the immediate passage of the administration ship-purchase bill. I ask that the joint resolution may be read.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was read, as follows:

[Resolution No. 20.]

Joint resolution memorializing the North Carolina Senators and Representatives in Congress in favor of the administration bill to secure ships for transportation.

Resolved by the senate (the house of representatives concurring), That the Senators and Representatives of North Carolina in the Congress of the United States are hereby memorialized and requested to do all within their power to secure the immediate passage of the administration bill to secure ships for the transportation of American products to the markets of the world.

We urge prompt action by our Senators and Representatives.

Resolved further, That copies of these resolutions be mailed immediately to each of our Senators and each of our Representatives in Congress at Washington.

In the general assembly read three times and ratified this the 16th day of February, 1915.

E. L. DAUGHTRIDGE,
President of the Senate.
E. R. WOOTEN,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Raleigh, February 16, 1915.

I, J. Bryan Grimes, secretary of state of the State of North Carolina, do hereby certify the foregoing and attached (one sheet) to be a true copy from the records of this office.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my official seal.

Done in office at Raleigh this 16th day of February, in the year of our Lord 1915.

[SEAL.] J. BRYAN GRIMES, Secretary of State.

Mr. CHILTON. On the same line I have received a communication from John F. McNamee, editor and manager of the Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen's Magazine, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the communication was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BROTHERHOOD OF LOCOMOTIVE FIREMEN AND ENGINEMEN'S MAGAZINE,
Indianapolis, Ind., February 13, 1915.

Hon. WILLIAM E. CHILTON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I would respectfully remind you that about 3,000,000 men are out of employment in the United States and that a large proportion of these men have families depending on them and that the wishes and the interests of the masses should be considered in connection with the Government ship-purchase bill as well as the views and selfish purposes of the plutocracy—of "big business."

I am inclosing to you herewith a page from the current issue of our official publication, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen's Magazine. Am sending you this expression of our views on the subject in this manner so as to insure its coming directly to your attention.

If the idle ships are put to work right away carrying commerce at shipping rates that will justify our merchants and manufacturers exporting goods, it can not but bring great and immediate relief, and we trust that in the interests of millions of your fellow citizens who "do not know where the next meal is coming from" you will kindly support this measure.

Yours, respectfully, JOHN F. MCNAMEE.

Mr. PITTMAN. I present a joint resolution of the Legislature of Nevada, transmitted to me in the form of a telegram, which I ask may be read.

There being no objection, the telegram was read, as follows:

CARSON, NEV., February 15, 1915.

Hon. KEY PITTMAN,
Washington, D. C.:

Joint and concurrent resolution relating to appropriation by Congress for irrigation purposes.

Whereas the great agricultural resources of Nevada are dependent upon the conservation of the waters and irrigation; and

Whereas there has been formed under the laws of this State an irrigation district called irrigation district No. 1, Carson Valley unit, Truckee-Carson project, for the express purpose of cooperating with the United States Government in constructing a reservoir for conserving the waters of Carson River and thereby reclaiming and irrigating over 50,000 acres of land; and

Whereas the Reclamation Service of the United States has recommended that the Government cooperate with the district, and it being essential and of primary importance that Congress appropriate at least $100,000 immediately to initiate and begin this work of reclaiming thousands of acres of land and opening them for homes for our people: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate (the assembly concurring), That we approve and favor the appropriation of $100,000 by Congress for the purpose of said reclamation project; and

Resolved further, That we hereby urge our Senators and Representatives in Congress to use all honorable means and efforts to secure such appropriation; and be it

Resolved further, That a copy of this resolution be telegraphed by the secretary of state to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from Nevada and that a copy be forwarded to the President of the United States.

H. R. MACK,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.
A. L. HAIGHT,
Secretary of the Senate.
A. G. MCBRIDE,
Speaker of the Assembly.
MAURICE J. SULLIVAN,
President of the Senate.

Approved February 13, 1915.

EMMETT D. BOYLE, Governor.

Mr. WALSH. I present a memorial of the Legislature of Montana, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House joint memorial No. 1.

[By Dwight N. Mason and C. M. Mansur.]

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Whereas there is now pending in the House of Representatives in the United States an act appropriating the sum of $500,000 for the purpose of irrigating certain lands on the Flathead Reservation in Montana;

Whereas the irrigation project on said reservation can not be carried on successfully or to the advantage of the settlers and allottes with an appropriation of a smaller amount than $500,000;

Whereas the work now undertaken is of such nature and of such an extent that it will be impossible to continue same with an amount less than herein stated; and

Whereas many settlers are solely dependent upon the early completion of said project in order that they may get water upon their lands, and that unless they receive water within the coming year their families may become destitute and starving: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved (the senate concurring), That we, the Fourteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, do hereby petition the Congress of the United States for the passage of the now pending act appropriating for reclamation purposes upon the Flathead irrigation project the sum of $500,000 as herein set forth.

Further resolved, That a copy of this memorial be forwarded by the secretary of state to the President of the United States and to the Secretary of the Interior and to our Senators and Representatives in Congress, with the request that they use their every effort to bring about a speedy passage of the act herein referred to and for the purposes therein indicated.

GEORGE L. RAMSEY,
Speaker of the House.
W. W. MCDOWELL,
President of the Senate.

Approved February 3, 1915.

S. V. STEWART, Governor.

Filed February 3, 1915, at 3 o'clock p. m.

A. M. ALDERSON, Secretary of State.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
State of Montana, ss:

I, A. M. Alderson, secretary of state of the State of Montana, do hereby certify that the above is a true and correct copy of house joint memorial No. 1, relative to the act now pending in the House of Representatives in the United States making an appropriation for the purpose of irrigating certain lands on the Flathead Reservation in Montana, enacted by the fourteenth session of the Legislative Assembly of the State of Montana, and approved by S. V. Stewart, governor of said State, on the 3d day of February, 1915.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of said State.

Done at the city of Helena, the capital of said State, this 8th day of February, A. D. 1915.

[SEAL.] A. M. ALDERSON, Secretary of State.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I present a telegram from the Chamber of Commerce of Athens, Ga., indorsing the administration ship-purchase bill. It is short, and I would like to have it read.

There being no objection, the telegram was read, as follows:

ATHENS, GA., February 16, 1915.

Hon. HOKE SMITH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The Athens Chamber of Commerce unanimously passed strong resolution indorsing administration ship-purchase bill, believing its passage of vital importance to the farming, manufacturing, and laboring interests of the South at a critical moment. Our committee is instructed to inform you of this resolution and urge your most ardent support.

Senate memorial No. 3.

To the Congress of the United States of America:

Your memorialists, the Legislature of the State of Arizona, in session assembled, do hereby memorialize and petition your honorable body that—

Whereas it has been and is the policy and the practice of the Federal Government to aid and assist the several States of the Union in the propagation and cultivation of the food fishes wherever found practicable; and

Whereas such aid and benefits as have been already given to many of the older States by the Government have not yet been extended to the infant State of Arizona:

Now, therefore, your memorialists respectfully pray that the Congress of the United States will enact such legislation and make such appropriation as in its judgment may seem adequate to provide and maintain a Government fish hatchery at some suitable place within the State of Arizona, for the purpose of stocking and replenishing the various streams and other bodies of water with food fishes found adaptable to such waters.

The secretary of the senate is hereby directed to forward a copy of this memorial to the United States Senate and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and a copy to Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST and Hon. MARCUS A. SMITH, United States Senators from Arizona, and to Hon. CARL HAYDEN, Representative in Congress from Arizona.

And our Senators and Representative are earnestly requested to do all in their power to bring about the legislation herein prayed for.

W. P. SIMS,
President of the Senate.
OSCAR COLE,
Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. WORKS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 7140) creating an additional land district in the State of California, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 999) thereon.

LANDS IN ALASKA.

Mr. STERLING. I report back favorably without amendment from the Committee on Public Lands the bill (S. 7515) to reserve lands to the Territory of Alaska for educational uses, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 994) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator from South Dakota if this is the emergency bill in relation to the public lands of Alaska which the Committee on Public Lands had under consideration this morning?

Mr. STERLING. Yes, sir; it is the bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will ask the Senator from South Dakota how much land is proposed to be reserved in Alaska for these purposes?

Mr. STERLING. It is proposed to reserve sections 16 and 36 for common-school purposes, to reserve section 33 within a certain area in the Tanana Valley for the purposes of an agricultural college and a school of mines, and then to reserve four sections near the town of Fairbanks, Alaska, for an agricultural college and school of mines.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That when the public lands of the Territory of Alaska are surveyed, under direction of the Government of the United States, sections No, 16 and 36 in each township in said Territory shall be, and the same are hereby, reserved from sale or settlement for the support of common schools in the Territory of Alaska; and section 33 in each township in the Tanana Valley between parallels 64 and 65 north latitude and between the one hundred and forty-fifth and the one hundred and fifty-second degrees of west longitude (meridian of Greenwich) shall be, and the same is hereby, reserved from sale or settlement for the support of a Territorial agricultural college and school of mines when established by the Legislature of Alaska upon the tract granted in section 2 of this act: Provided, That where settlement with a view to homestead entry has been made upon any part of the sections reserved hereby before the survey thereof in the field, or where the same may have been sold or otherwise appropriated by or under the authority of any act of Congress, or are wanting or fractional in quantity, other lands may be designated and reserved in lieu thereof in the manner provided by the act of Congress of February 28, 1891 (26 Stat., p. 791): Provided further, That the Territory may, by general law, provide for leasing said land in area not to exceed one section to any one person, association, or corporation for not longer than 10 years at any one time: And provided further, That if any of said sections, or any part thereof, shall be of known mineral character at the date of acceptance of survey thereof, the reservation herein made shall not be effective or applicable, but the entire proceeds or income derived by the United States from such sections 16 and 36 and such section 33 in each township in the Tanana Valley area hereinbefore described, and the minerals therein, together with the entire proceeds or income derived from said reserved lands, are hereby appropriated and set apart as separate and permanent funds in the Territorial treasury, to be invested and the income from which shall be expended only for the exclusive use and benefit of the public schools of Alaska or of the agricultural college and school of mines, respectively, in such manner as the Legislature of Alaska may by law direct.

SEC. 2. That section No. 6, in township No. 1 south of the Fairbanks base line and range No. 1 west of the Fairbanks meridian; section No. 31, in township No. 1 north of the Fairbanks base line and range No. 1 west of the Fairbanks meridian; section No. 1, in township No. 1 south of the Fairbanks base line and range No. 2 west of the Fairbanks meridian; and section No. 36, in township No. 1 north of the Fairbanks base line and range No. 2 west of the Fairbanks meridian, be, and the same are hereby, granted to the Territory of Alaska, but with the express condition that they shall be forever reserved and dedicated to use as a site for an agricultural college and school of mines: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be held to interfere with or destroy any legal claim of any person or corporation to any part of said lands under the homestead or other law for the disposal of the public lands acquired prior to the approval of this act: Provided further, That so much of the said land as is now used by the Government of the United States as an agricultural experiment station may continue to be used for such purpose until abandoned for that use by an order of the President of the United States or by act of Congress.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT GARDEN CITY, KANS.

Mr. SWANSON. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (S. 7188) to increase the limit of cost of the United States post-office building at Garden City, Kans., to report it with amendments, and I submit a report (No. 905) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] to the bill.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of that bill. It is a local matter, relating to a building which is in process of construction in my home town, Garden City. The amount involved is only $6,000, and the money for the building is needed at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if there is any emergency about this matter?

Mr. THOMPSON. There is an emergency in connection with it. The bill has not yet passed the House, and there is a pressing need that it be acted upon as soon as possible. If it does not reach the House soon it can not be passed this session.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to ask the Senator from Kansas what is the emergency?

Mr. THOMPSON. The building is in process of construction, and it is proposed to change it from wood to fireproof construction, and for that reason the money is needed. The bill is recommended by the department and by the contractor.

Mr. SMOOT. If this bill should not be passed now, would the work be held up?

Mr. THOMPSON. There would be such delay that it would cost a great deal more to complete the building, and that is not desired by anyone. If there is no special session, the amount could not be provided for before December, and the time for the completion of the building under the contract will have expired before that time.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator how this differs from other situations throughout the country?

Mr. THOMPSON. I think there is a difference. The building is in process of construction, and we need $6,050 additional to complete it in the manner desired by the Government as well as the people of my home town.

Mr. ROOT. I know of a good many public buildings which have been authorized, the work upon which is delayed and which it would be very agreeable to me and to my colleagues and to our constituents to have expedited. Why is this particular situation to constitute an exception to the slowing down of expenditures upon public buildings, which ought to accompany a great deficit in the Treasury and the necessity of imposing additional taxes, such as a special war-revenue tax, in spite of which there is still a deficit? What is the difference between this and other similar situations?

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, Congress has authorized $60,000 for the construction of this building at Garden City, and contracts are being entered into. The building was to be entirely of wood construction, but by the expenditure of $6,050 it can be made fireproof, which is thought more desirable and necessary. Of course, if this bill is not passed, they will have to continue to construct the building entirely of wood. The amount involved is only $6,050 additional.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have tried to explain that the work is in progress now and the need urgent for the early passage of the bill. The amount is needed; the change is recommended by the department and the contractor, and I should like to have the bill passed now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments, in line 8, after the word "as," to strike out "recommended" and insert "estimated"; and in the same line, after the word "contractor," to strike out "and the Supervising Architect," and insert "for additional fireproof construction and other betterments," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the limit of cost of the United States post-office building at Garden City, Kans., be, and the same is hereby, increased $6,050, or so much thereof as may be necessary to meet the additional cost of construction of said building in order to make the building more substantial and fireproof, as estimated by the contractor for additional fireproof construction and other betterments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 240) adopting "The Star-Spangled Banner," words by Francis Scott Key and music of Samuel Arnold, as the national anthem (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PURCHASE OF MONTICELLO.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I introduce a joint resolution and ask that it be appropriately referred.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 237) creating a commission and authorizing said commission to acquire, by purchase, the property known as Monticello, and embracing the former home of Thomas Jefferson and the park surrounding the same, consisting of 700 acres of land, all of said property being located in Albemarle County, Va., was read twice by its title.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not know whether this is similar to the joint resolution that is now on the calendar.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I am not aware that there is a similar resolution on the calendar.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that there is a joint resolution for the same purpose on the calendar.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I was not aware of the fact.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey subsequently said:

I find that the joint resolution referred to by the Senator from Utah, and which is now on the calendar, is different in purport. The anticipation is the same, but the method of acquiring the property is different. I ask that the joint resolution introduced by me be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so referred.

AMENDMENT TO GENERAL DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland submitted an amendment authorizing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to accept one-half of 1 per cent of the annual gross revenue of the East Washington Heights Traction Railroad Co. as full compensation for all amounts due or hereafter to become due for the use of the Pennsylvania Avenue bridge by that company, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL (H. R. 21318).

Mr. JONES submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $65,000 toward the maintenance of Howard University in the District of Columbia, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $75,000 to provide for the medical and sanitary relief of the Eskimos, Aleuts, Indians, and other natives of Alaska, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for the maintenance of vessels under the direction of the Commissioner of Fisheries, from $60,000 to $75,000, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for general service for protecting the seal fisheries in Alaska from $65,000 to $85,000, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for the protection and improvement of Mount Rainier National Park, Wash., from $30,000 to $51,000, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for the maintenance and operation of the Yakima project, in the State of Washington, from $1,250,000 to $1,283,000, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LANE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $50,000 for continuing the construction of the post-office building at Portland, Oreg., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $20,000 for clearing up dead and down timber and underbrush now in the road to be constructed in the Crater Lake National Park, Oreg., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STONE. Under the direction of the Committee on Foreign Relations—and I desire the RECORD to show the statement—I send to the desk two amendments intended to be proposed to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill (H. R. 19909), which I ask may be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that action will be taken.

Mr. STONE subsequently said:

Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] informs me that the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill has been reported and is on the calendar. I was not aware of the fact. Instead, therefore, of having the amendments referred to the Committee on Appropriations I presume it will answer to let them be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. OVERMAN. I beg to inquire of the Senator what the amendments are. Perhaps they might go to some other committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Let them be read.

Mr. STONE. I have no objection to having them read.

The SECRETARY. On page 35, line 20, it is proposed to strike out the words "thirty thousand" and to insert the words "seventy-five thousand."

On page 36, lines 12 and 13, it is proposed to strike out the words "For rent of buildings in the District of Columbia, $11,200," and to insert the words:

For rent of buildings in the District of Columbia, $15,000; and the Secretary of State is hereby authorized, in his judgment, to enter into a lease for a period not exceeding five years for the occupancy of a suitable building within close proximity to the Department of State at an annual rental not to exceed the sum herein appropriated.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I will ask that the amendments be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, it is all right if the amendments are to be referred, but I merely desire to say to the Senate that the report just made by the Senator from Missouri makes each of the amendments in order.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS.

Mr. SWANSON. I submit a resolution and ask that it be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the resolution be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 547) was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized during the Sixty-third Congress to subpœna witnesses, to send for books and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a price not to exceed $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had or may have been had in connection with any subject which may be pending or may have been pending before the said committee; that the committee may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate, and the expense thereof shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

LANDS AT NEVADAVILLE, COLO.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2518) granting to the town of Nevadaville, Colo., the right to purchase certain lands for the protection of water supply, which was on page 3, line 20, after the word "Nevadaville," to insert "and within two years after the passage of this act."

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the amendment made by the House is simply a limitation that the grant shall be made within two years after the passage of the act. I move to concur in the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Let the bill be read. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state to the Senator that it is simply a right of way, which covers a very few acres, I think, about 18.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection to the bill, but I want to have the amendment read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the House will be again stated.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Is that the only amendment?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is the only amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment made by the House of Representatives.

The amendment was concurred in.

LAND ENTRIES IN COLORADO AND WYOMING.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 5629) for the relief of certain persons who made entry under the provisions of section 6, act of May 29, 1908, which was on page 2, line 15, to strike out all after the word "act," down to and including the word "granted," in line 17.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I move concurrence in the House amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Before that is done I should like to know just what the amendment is.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The amendment strikes out the words at the close of the bill, "but the right to make new locations in lieu thereof for lands subject to homestead entry is hereby granted." Those words are stricken out, and as passed by the House the bill really has less in it than as passed by the Senate by reason of striking out those words.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. May I ask the Senator from Colorado, is this a private bill taking care of a single case or a general bill? What is the bill?

Mr. SHAFROTH. It is a bill covering a few cases where the persons made entry under a certain act of Congress. The provision was that having lived five years upon the land they would be entitled to transfer their residence to new lands. Some of it is in Wyoming and some in Colorado, but altogether it is a very small amount.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask that the bill itself be read so that we can follow the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill as proposed to be amended.

The Secretary read the bill as amended by the House, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all entries made by beneficiaries under section 6 of the act of Congress approved May 29, 1908, entitled "An act authorizing a resurvey of certain townships in the State of Wyoming, and for other purposes" (35 Stats., p. 465), in connection with which such beneficiaries have submitted proof of their compliance with the homestead law in Wisconsin, and where such proof shows full five years' residence and improvements on the Wisconsin land, to which their title failed by reason of the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of the Wisconsin Central Railroad Co. v. Forsythe (159 U. S., p. 46), whether such entry is now being asserted by the original entryman or by his transferee, be, and the same are hereby, confirmed, and the Secretary of the Interior is directed to issue patents thereon: Provided, That this legislation is to be construed as only removing the objection with relation to transfer, heretofore raised by the Interior Department against said entries, and is not to be construed as confirming entries, if any, made for lands not subject to entry or entries made by persons not entitled thereto: Provided further, That if any of the said entries under the remedial act or amendments thereto have been canceled and the lands embraced therein reentered by intervening adverse claimants, such canceled entries are not to be reinstated and validated by this act.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The House propose to strike out the words "but the right to make new locations in lieu thereof for lands subject to homestead entry is hereby granted."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will ask if that is the only amendment proposed to the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the only amendment proposed.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the amendment is a proper one, and I certainly have no objection to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment made by the House of Representatives.

The amendment was concurred in.

LANDS IN THE STATE OF WASHINGTON.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, there is a House bill on the desk similar in its provisions to Senate bill 6671, being Order of Business No. 829. It validates some patents in fee issued for Indian allotments. I ask unanimous consent that the House bill may be laid before the Senate and substituted for the Senate bill now on the calendar.

The bill (H. R. 19376) confirming patents heretofore issued to certain Indians in the State of Washington was read twice by its title.

Mr. JONES. As I said, the House bill is exactly the same as Senate bill 6671—Order of Business No. 829—which has been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the House bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, Senate bill 6671 on the same subject will be indefinitely postponed.

SALE OF SEALSKINS.

Mr. THOMAS. In behalf of the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON], who is ill, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of House joint resolution 391, authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to postpone the sale of fur sealskins now in the possession of the Government until such time as in his discretion he may deem such sale advisable. As giving the reason for the necessity for immediate action I send to the desk a letter from the Secretary of Commerce which I ask to have read.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, morning business is not yet closed, is it?

Mr. THOMAS. I understood that it was.

Mr. NORRIS. I think not.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] was recognized for a similar purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; morning business is not closed, but it is always in order to ask unanimous consent.

Mr. THOMAS. This is a request for unanimous consent, and the purpose of it will be explained, I hope, to the satisfaction of the Senator, by a short letter from the Secretary of Commerce which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

Mr. NORRIS. I would not have any objection, if it did not take up any time; but there are other things in the morning business that I would not like to have go over on account of it.

Mr. THOMAS. This is a request for unanimous consent. The letter is a very short one.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say that I objected to the consideration of this joint resolution the other day when it was reported; but I have read the letter of the Secretary of Commerce, showing the absolute necessity and urgency of the matter, and therefore I have no objection to its consideration at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of Commerce be, and he hereby is, authorized to postpone the sale of all skins now in possession of the Government taken from seals killed on the Pribilof Islands for food purposes, under section 11 of the act of August 24, 1912, until such time as, in his discretion, he shall deem advisable, and the proceeds of such sale shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. THOMAS. I ask to have the letter to which I referred printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, February 16, 1915.

Hon. CHARLES S. THOMAS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: On December 19, 1914, Senator THORNTON introduced a joint resolution in the Senate (S. J. Res. 214) authorizing the Secretary of Commerce "To postpone the sale of fur-seal skins now in possession of the Government until such time as in his discretion he may deem such sale advisable." A similar resolution was introduced in the House of Representatives on December 18, 1914, at the request of the department by Judge ALEXANDER, House joint resolution 391, and referred to the House Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

On December 21, 1914, the Senate unanimously passed the resolution introduced by Senator THORNTON, and on December 22, 1914, such passage was reported to the House. The House thereupon referred such resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations, instead of to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, as had been done with the resolution introduced by Judge ALEXANDER. This latter resolution was reached for passage in the House on February 3, 1915. Judge ALEXANDER at that time sought to have the Senate resolution substituted for the House resolution, in order that its passage might complete the legislation, but this was objected to, and thereupon the House passed its own resolution. The passage of this resolution was reported to the Senate on the following day. On February 11 Senator THORNTON sought to have the House resolution passed by the Senate under unanimous consent, but this was objected to, and the resolution went to the Senate Calendar.

Under the law as it now is (sec. 11 of the act of Aug. 24, 1912, 37 Stat., 499) the Secretary of Commerce is required to sell annually the skins of all seals taken on the Pribilof Islands for food purposes. Previously to last year the skins of all seals taken from the Pribilof Islands have been disposed of annually in London, England. Instead of holding last year's sale in that city the department arranged for a public sale of the sealskins, taken during the year for food purposes, at St. Louis. Many buyers were present from the various European countries; there was a great deal of competition, and the prices received by the department were highly satisfactory.

The total number of skins taken for food purposes during this last year was 3,284, and therefore the department now has on hand for sale this year that number of skins. A large number of dealers in various parts of the United States have been consulted with as to the advisability of holding the sale during this present fiscal year, and while all of them advocate the continuance of the sales in the United States they are practically unanimous against holding one this year, and strongly urge a postponement until the conditions are more favorable. It is quite evident that foreign buyers, especially from those nations now engaged in war, would not attend a sale at this time, and consequently there would be less competition and the prices received would be very much lower. At the same time, the conditions in our country at present are not favorable to the sale of high-priced furs.

The department feels that the postponement of this sale is purely a business proposition and precisely what a prudent business man would do under existing conditions with property of his own. There is every reason to believe that the market will improve, but even if this should not be the case the increase of competition by waiting until foreign buyers can be present will certainly be of benefit to the Government in that better prices will be obtained. At the prices received at the sale on December 19, 1913, in St. Louis the skins now on hand would be worth approximately $95,000, and I feel that if we are forced to sell them at the present time many thousand dollars will be lost to the Government. For these reasons I am very desirous of having this resolution passed as expeditiously as possible, and earnestly request your cooperation to that end.

Very truly, yours,

WILLIAM C. REDFIELD, Secretary.

AMENDMENT OF FEDERAL RESERVE ACT.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to dispose of House bill 15038, being Order of Business No. 749, authorizing the Federal Reserve Board under certain restrictions to enlarge acceptances.

Mr. GALLINGER. I shall object to any further unanimous consents until the morning business is closed, and I therefore object to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. OWEN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Order of Business 749 at this time.

Mr. PENROSE and others. Regular order!

Mr. OWEN. In view of the fact that the hour of 1 o'clock has not arrived, I withdraw the motion.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On February 17, 1915:

S. 1060. An act fixing the date of reenlistment of Gustav Hertfelder, first-class fireman, United States Navy;

S. 3525. An act for the relief of Pay Inspector F. T. Arms, United States Navy; and

S. 543. An act to correct the military record of John T. Haines.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 5259) to establish one or more United States Navy mail lines between the United States and South America and between the United States and the countries of Europe, which were as follows:

On page 1, line 3, after "That," insert "with the approval of the President."

On page 2, line 5, strike out "shall" and insert "to."

On page 4, after line 20, insert:

"SEC. 5. That the United States, acting through the shipping board hereinafter created, may subscribe to the capital stock of a corporation of the District of Columbia. Said corporation shall have for its object the purchase, construction, equipment, maintenance, and operation of merchant vessels to meet the requirements of the foreign commerce of the United States, or to charter vessels for such purposes, and to make charters or leases of any vessel or vessels owned by such corporation to any other corporation, organized under the laws of a State, a majority of the stock being owned by citizens of the United States, firm or individual citizen or citizens of the United States, to be used for such purposes, and shall have power to carry out said objects and purposes: Provided, That the terms and conditions of such charter parties shall first be approved by the shipping board, the initial capital stock of which corporation shall not be over $10,000,000, of the par value of $100 per share: And provided further, That said corporation shall make no charter ar lease of any vessel to any corporation, firm, or individual for a longer period than 12 months, and said corporation shall specify in the charter or lease the rates, charges, and fares to be observed by such corporation, firm, or individual chartering or leasing any such vessel or vessels as a maximum to be charged during the life of such charter or lease, and there shall be contained in said charter or lease a provision terminating the same whenever the charterer or the lessee shall violate any of its provisions. It is hereby made the duty of such corporation to take such steps as may be necessary to terminate any such charter or lease whenever the corporation, firm, or individual, party to such charter or lease, shall violate the provisions of the same.

"The members of said shipping board, as incorporators, may for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act, form a corporation of the District of Columbia, by making and filing a certificate of incorporation, as provided in subchapter 4 of chapter 18 of an act entitled 'An act to establish a code of laws for the District of Columbia,' approved March 3, 1901.

"The corporation so formed, its officers and trustees and stockholders, shall possess all the powers conferred and perform all the duties imposed by said subchapter 4, except as the same are by this act limited or qualified.

"The powers of said corporation shall be limited to the purposes of this act and to such as are necessarily incident thereto.

"Said corporation may sue and be sued in any district court of the United States, and may remove to said courts any cause brought against it in any other court.

"Said corporation may require any officer or employee to give security for the faithful performance of his duties.

"Persons subscribing to the stock of said company shall pay for the same in full at the time of subscription.

"The stock owned by the United States shall be voted by the shipping board or its duly selected representative.

"The officers and trustees of said corporation shall be citizens of the United States, but need not be citizens of the District of Columbia. Such officers and trustees shall be subject to removal at any time by vote of a majority of the stock at any meeting thereof.

"Said corporation and its capital stock shall, so long as the United States owns a majority of said stock, be free from all public taxes.

"At no time shall less than 51 per cent of the stock of said corporation be held by the United States, unless the United States shall dispose of all of its stock.

"Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

"SEC. 6. That the United States shall subscribe to 51 per cent of the initial capital stock of such corporation at par, and the remainder thereof may be offered for public subscription at not less than par, and the United States may then further subscribe at par for any amount of such stock not taken by public subscription, but the shipping board may cause such corporation to begin business as soon as 51 per cent of such stock has been subscribed and paid for by the United States. The shipping board, with the approval of the President, may consent to or may cause an increase of the capital stock from time to time as the interests of the corporation may require, but without authority of Congress the portion of such increase to be paid for by the United States shall not exceed $10,000,000, neither shall the proportion of stock held by the United States at any time be less than 51 per cent: Provided, That a sufficient number of the shares of stock of said corporation shall be set apart for holding by the persons for whom the stock of the United States may be voted as trustees, and such shares shall be issued or transferred to such persons to qualify them as trustees of such corporation, and such shares shall be transferred to the successor or successors of any such person or persons.

"SEC. 7. That the United States, through the shipping board and with the approval of the President, is authorized to purchase or construct vessels suitable in the judgment of the shipping board for the purposes of such corporation with a view to transferring them to such corporation, and for this purpose the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the request of the shipping board and the approval of the President, may issue and sell or use for such purchases or construction any of the bonds of the United States now available in the Treasury of the United States under the act of August 5, 1909, the act of February 4, 1910, and the act of March 2, 1911, relating to the issue of bonds for the construction of the Panama Canal, to a total amount not to exceed $30,000,000, for the purpose of purchasing or constructing such vessels: Provided, That any Panama Canal bonds issued and sold or used under the provisions of this section or other existing authority may be made payable at such time after issue as the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, may deem advisable and fix, instead of 50 years after date of issue, as in said act of August 5, 1909, not exceeding 50 years: Provided further, That payments for such purchases or construction from the proceeds of sales of bonds, or delivery of bonds in payment thereof, shall be made only as ordered and directed by the shipping board: And provided further, That in making purchases of ships during the continuance of the present European war no purchases shall be made in a way which will disturb the conditions of neutrality.

"SEC. 8. That the shipping board is authorized to transfer the vessels purchased or constructed as herein provided to any such corporation in which the United States has become a stockholder as hereinbefore provided, and such corporation shall issue to the United States in payment thereof its gold bonds, bearing interest at not less than 4 per cent per annum, and upon such further terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the shipping board, such bonds to be secured by a first-mortgage lien upon such vessels, severally, thus transferred: Provided, That the amount of bonds received by the United States in payment for such vessels shall not be less, at the then par value, than the total amount expended by the United States in the purchase or construction of such vessels, and the same may be sold by the Secretary of the Treasury, in his discretion, and with the approval of the President, to reimburse the Treasury for expenditures made in the purchase or construction of vessels: And provided further, That said corporation shall not issue any bonds in excess of $40,000,000, or incur any liabilities other than stock issues in excess of $10,000,000. Such corporation shall make suitable provision for sinking fund and for the depreciation charges under the rules and regulations to be prescribed by such shipping board; and all vessels acquired under this act, or in which the United States shall otherwise be interested as owner, in whole or in part, or upon which the United States shall have or hold any mortgage, pledge, lien, or other security, shall, when and while employed solely as merchant vessels, be in all respects subject to all laws, regulations, and liabilities governing merchant vessels in like manner and to the same extent as merchant vessels in private ownership when duly registered under the laws of the United States.

"All rules and regulations relating to or which affect shipping, navigation, or water-borne commerce of the United States heretofore made or published, by authority of law, shall only be and remain in force until midnight on the 31st day of December, 1915, and by proclamation of the President shall cease to have any force or validity at any prior date when new shipping rules and regulations shall, as provided hereby, take the place of those now in existence.

"The shipping board herein provided for shall propose such rules and regulations applicable to the shipping and water-borne commerce of the United States in lieu of those now in force and covering matters of like character as they may determine suited to the present needs of such shipping and commerce, which, when approved by the President and published, shall apply and become of full force and effect in lieu of such rules and regulations as are now applicable thereto. In the rules and regulations hereby authorized to be adopted and put into force different classes of shipping, navigation, and water-borne commerce may be appropriately and differently treated and provided for. Such rules and regulations when promulgated may be modified, changed, or amended by the shipping board.

"SEC. 9. That vessels purchased or constructed by such shipping board and conveyed to such corporation as herein provided shall be entitled to registry under the laws of the United States, and shall be deemed vessels of the United States and entitled to the benefits and privileges appertaining to such vessels, except such vessels shall engage only in trade with foreign countries or with Alaska, the Philippine Islands, the Hawaiian Islands, and the islands of Porto Rico, Guam, and Tutuila: Provided, That the above restrictions shall not apply to such of said vessels as are built in the United States. Such vessels shall be subject to the navigation laws of the United States except as herein provided.

"SEC. 10. That the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Commerce and three additional members, two of whom shall be of practical experience in the management and operation of steamships in the foreign trade, are hereby constituted a board to be known as the shipping board, with full power, subject to the approval of the President, to vote the stock of the United States in said corporation, either as a body or by one or more of its members duly authorized by a majority, and to do all things necessary, whether specifically enumerated or not, to carry out the purposes of this act and protect the interests of the United States, said three additional members to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The salary of each of the three additional members of said board so appointed shall be $6,000 per annum.

"SEC. 11. That, with the approval of the Congress, such shipping board may at any time sell the stock of such corporation owned by the United States.

"SEC. 12. That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to charter, lease, or transfer such naval auxiliaries belonging to the Naval Establishment of the United States as are suitable for commercial use and which are not required for use in the Navy in time of peace, and vessels belonging to the War Department suitable for commercial uses and not required for military transports in time of peace, and to direct or cause to be chartered, leased, or transferred vessels now owned and operated by the Panama Railroad Co., to any corporation now or hereafter organized as in this act provided upon such terms and conditions as the shipping board, with the approval of the President of the United States, shall prescribe. The vessels purchased or constructed by the United States through the shipping board, with the approval of the President of the United States, shall be of a type, as far as the commercial requirements of the foreign trade of the United States may permit, suitable for use as naval auxiliaries in the Naval Establishment of the United States.

"SEC. 13. That the President of the United States, upon giving to any such corporation in which the United States shall be a stockholder, through its president, vice president, secretary, or manager, notice in writing for such reasonable length of time as in his judgment the circumstances require and will permit of his intention so to do, may take possession, absolutely or temporarily, for use as naval auxiliaries of any vessel or vessels owned or leased by or otherwise in the possession of said corporation, and said corporation shall be entitled to a reasonable price or rental therefor, to be fixed by the shipping board, with the approval of the President: Provided, That if in the judgment of the President an emergency exists requiring such action he may take possession of any such vessel or vessels without notice.

"SEC. 14. That the shipping board shall make to Congress, at the beginning of each regular session, a report of expenditures and receipts under this act and of the operations of any corporation in which the United States may have become a stockholder hereunder.

"SEC. 15. That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000,000, or, in lieu of such appropriation, the Secretary of the Treasury may sell Panama Canal bonds to the amount of $10,000,000 in addition to those provided for in section 7, and on the same terms, and set apart and use the proceeds thereof for such purposes.

"SEC. 16. That two years from and after the conclusion of the present European war, that fact to be determined by the President, the corporation and the shipping board shall turn over and transfer all vessels purchased or constructed under the provisions of this act to the Navy Department, and the Secretary of the Navy shall have the right, with the approval of the President, to lease or charter any of such vessels not needed for naval or military purposes to any firm, individual, or corporation for use as merchant vessels.

"That the Secretary of the Navy shall in such leases provide for their cancellation whenever such vessels may be required for naval or military purposes.

"That all leases made under this section of the act shall be subject to all of the provisions of section 5 of this act relating to maximum rates and charges and terms and conditions of forfeiture.

"That when the vessels, land, piers, leases for land or piers, and other property held by the corporation are disposed of as herein provided the corporation herein provided for shall be dissolved and said shipping board abolished.

"SEC 17. That sections 1, 2, 3, and 4 of this act shall not take effect until two years from and after the conclusion of the present European war, that fact to be determined by the President."

Amend the title to read as follows: "An act to establish one or more United States Navy mail lines between the United States and South America and between the United States and the countries of Europe, and for other purposes."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments made by the House and ask for a conference, the Chair to appoint seven conferees as managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. A question of order, Mr. President. The Senator from Florida has made, as is customary, in making that motion, three motions in one. It is usual to make it in that way where there is no objection. He has moved, first, that we disagree to the amendments united, all the amendments, and then that we appoint conferees. Mr. President, the motion to disagree must be disposed of first, because it is impossible to see whether we disagree or whether we concur.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. If anyone raises the question, it is a triple motion in one which the Senator from Florida has made, and the motion could only be entertained by unanimous consent. It is divisible into three parts; certainly it is divisible into two—the motion to disagree and the motion to ask for a conference. There may be nothing to ask for a conference on.

I make the point that the motion be divided.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have submitted the motion in the usual form. I think it is one question; there is the one matter before the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. I know it is the usual form, which prevails here by unanimous consent and without objection; but in this case a division is asked for. There is objection, and a division is asked for.

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. Would not a motion to concur in the amendments of the House with an amendment be under the rules of this body a preferential motion, entitled to first consideration?

Mr. LODGE. Beyond a doubt.

Mr. HARDWICK. I have here authority for it, and I ask recognition from the Chair to submit such a motion, which is preferential to the motion submitted by the Senator from Florida.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understood that the Senator from Massachusetts was rising to a point of order.

Mr. LODGE. My point of order is that this motion must be divided; that the first question is the separate dealing with the amendments, and we can not decide on what we shall do until we have considered the amendments. We can not decide on asking a conference until we know whether there is any conference to ask. We have to consider the motion to disagree first.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts know of any instance in which when the Senate has disagreed there was not a conference requested and the conferees appointed?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the matter has been decided, and is the well-known practice of both Houses. Under section 1367 the motion to ask for a conference comes properly after a motion to disagree, insist, or adhere. There is no question that there are two motions. One motion is to disagree. It does not follow that they will ask for a conference. They may decide to adhere; they may decide to insist; they may decide to concur. One House can not be cut off from its right to deal with the amendments of the other House by uniting a motion to disagree and a motion to ask a conference. The question is clearly divisible.

Mr. FLETCHER. There can be no conference unless there is a disagreement.

Mr. LODGE. Ah, Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. The motion to disagree involves the other question. There can not be——

Mr. LODGE. A conference can be asked without a motion to disagree.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Florida a question, if I may be permitted. I should like to ask the Senator from Florida what becomes of the preferential right to move to concur. If the motion which he has just made is adopted, for instance, I desire to move to concur with an amendment, and my right to do so is entirely cut off. Although it is a preferential motion and well recognized in the procedure of the Senate, my right to move to concur with an amendment is entirely cut off if the motion of the Senator from Florida prevails.

There can be no doubt whatever, as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] said a moment ago, of the preferential right to move to concur. I desire to exercise also a preferential right to move to concur with an amendment. I do not want to be cut off by any practice prevailing here of permitting a conference to be appointed by unanimous consent.

Mr. FLETCHER. That question is not now before the Senate, as I understand it. It is a question for the Chair to decide.

Mr. HARDWICK. I should like to read——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; I, of course, retaining the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. I can not understand how the Senator can divide this into three propositions. It seems perfectly plain to me that there are only two propositions, a motion to disagree and a motion to ask for a conference. They are separate propositions, but a motion to ask for a conference would naturally and properly take with it the appointment of conferees.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; but the method of appointing those conferees is not settled by the rules. That, however, is a small point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that the question is divisible into two parts, one, whether the Senate shall disagree to the amendments of the House, and, two, whether a conference shall be requested and conferees appointed.

Mr. LODGE. Now, Mr. President, the Chair having ruled on that point, the motion now being that of the Senator from Florida to disagree, I make the further point that there are three amendments—four, I believe, and more; but there are three amendments made by the House to this bill. The House took separate votes on each one of them and also amended the title. The ruling on that is clear. It was ruled by Speaker Crisp that the pending amendments of the Senate should severally be considered in their respective order. There are here three separate amendments of the House and an amendment to the title. I have not any question that section 17 is also a separate amendment, because it is not connected with the sections from 5 to 16, inclusive. It is not in order, I am aware, to refer to what is said in the other House, but it is in order to quote a ruling of the Speaker on a point of parliamentary law. Mr. MANN made the point of order that—

There are 13 sections in the amendment, 13 separate propositions, besides a dozen or so other propositions which are divisible. I only ask for a division of the sections.

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly the gentleman is right. The Clerk will report the first section, so that Members will know what they are voting on.

The Clerk will report the first subdivision.

The Clerk read as follows:

"SEC. 5."—

They then voted on that. There can be no doubt that there are three, and I believe more amendments, besides the amendment to the title. Therefore, under the ruling of Speaker Crisp and under the universal practice of both bodies, we should proceed to consider those amendments in order, certainly separately, and under the ruling of Speaker CLARK on yesterday.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair, as at present constituted, believes that it is not a divisible question as to whether the Senate will disagree to the amendments of the House.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Chair rules, then, I understand, that the amendments of the House are not divisible?

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the motion of the Senator from Florida the Chair holds that it is a single question.

Mr. LODGE. On all the amendments at once?

The VICE PRESIDENT. On all the amendments.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I very respectfully appeal from that, and I should like to be heard briefly on the appeal.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the ruling of the Chair be sustained?

Mr. LODGE. I desire to be heard on the appeal.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I merely wish to say that our rules provide——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. LODGE. I shall take a very few moments. Our rules provide that any one Senator can demand a division of a question. This is a question on agreeing to the House amendments. I ask for a division of that question, and I ask for a division of that question into the amendments which the House treated as separate questions, every one, taking a separate record vote on each one. There can not possibly be a case in which the different subjects are clearer than that. I am simply exercising the right secured to every Senator in this body to ask for a division of the question.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, it was decided, I remember, by Vice President Sherman——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I can not go into decisions by Vice President Sherman that the Senator has not here to read, and also——

Mr. SWANSON. I will read it to the Senator if he will wait a minute—the decision, as laid down when a pension bill was pending, on which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] desired to have a vote on each one of the amendments. Vice President Sherman decided that it could not be divided on the main question, but that the only way you could have a division would be by amendment. The Senator from Georgia well remembers that decision, and I presume the Senator from Massachusetts remembers it.

Mr. LODGE. If a decision was made by Vice President Sherman that you could not take a vote on each amendment, I believe the decision was wrong; but I doubt very much if he made such a decision.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LODGE. I do not want to yield the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. No. I remember well the case the Senator from Virginia refers to, but the question decided was not that we could not vote on any amendments. The Senator from Georgia asked for a vote on every particular item, and that was the ruling that was made by Vice President Sherman.

Mr. SWANSON. The ruling made then, I understand, was that on the main question a Senator could not ask for a division; that the only way to reach that would be by offering amendments to the main question. There was a pension bill here with 100 items in it. The Senator from Georgia asked for a division on each question as a distinct proposition.

Mr. LODGE. Those were not House amendments to a Senate bill.

Mr. SWANSON. Then the Vice President ruled that the only way it could be reached——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not yield further. The case, as the Senator states it, is not one that is parallel. The question before the Senate at this moment is, Will the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House? I asked for a division; that is, I asked for a division into separate amendments, which are every one separate questions, and were so treated in the House of Representatives. There can be no question whatever in anybody's mind that the proposal to change the word "shall" to the word "to" in the Weeks bill——

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator from Massachusetts contend that the motion is for that reason out of order?

Mr. LODGE. What motion?

Mr. NORRIS. The motion to disagree.

Mr. LODGE. Not for a moment. The motion is entirely in order.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, it seems to me that the Senator's contention narrows itself down to the proposition that when we come to vote we would be entitled to a separate vote on each one of the amendments, but that the motion would not be in order by including them all in one?

Mr. LODGE. My contention rests, Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Nebraska, upon the following provision of Rule XVIII:

> If the question in debate contains several propositions, any Senator may have the same divided, except a motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. One moment. Any Senator may have the question divided. That is the right of any single Senator; but my contention is that it is impossible to maintain that those three amendments of the House, to go no further, are not divisible.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not understand that the Senator made that point when the Chair ruled.

Mr. LODGE. That is the point.

Mr. NORRIS. I understood the Senator was demanding a separate vote.

Mr. LODGE. That is the point I thought I was making.

Mr. NORRIS. I supposed the Senator was contending that the motion was out of order because it included several propositions.

Mr. LODGE. Not at all. I was simply contending that the question raised on the motion made by the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] was divisible. That is the only point I am making, and I understood the Chair to hold that it was not divisible; that it did not contain three different subjects; that the question of whether we should agree to change the word "shall," in the original Weeks bill, to the word "to" is no different from the question involved in the sections from 5 to 18, inclusive, which put an entire new measure into the Weeks bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut will state it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I want to ask the Chair whether the ruling of the Chair is that, there being three House amendments, the Senate has got either to agree or to disagree to the whole of them?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Oh, no.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And that we can not have a separate vote on each amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the Chair has not so ruled.

Mr. LODGE. Then I misunderstood the Chair, and I beg pardon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the Senator from Massachusetts did not misunderstand the Chair, either. The Chair does not know how any Senator is going to vote; he has had experience on that question. The Chair thinks this is different from the ordinary rule, which is a clear one, that when several propositions are embraced in a motion it is divisible, and that a Senator is entitled to have it divided and to vote upon each proposition; but the Chair assumes in this particular instance that every Senator who is in favor of the adoption of any one of the House amendments will vote against disagreement to the House amendments. Therefore the Chair thinks it is but one question; that is, Will the Senate agree to the House amendments?

Mr. LODGE. Then, Mr. President, I did not misunderstand the Chair. The Chair holds that the proposition to agree to all these amendments on one motion is not divisible; that it does not involve three questions or more, and that if a Senator wishes to concur in one amendment and wishes to disagree to another he will vote against disagreement. That deprives him of his right to agree; it deprives the Senate of the right to agree. The Senate may desire to agree to any one of these amendments—it is constantly done in both Houses; there are innumerable instances where it has been done—and, of course, that right is absolutely cut off if this question is not divisible.

The junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK] proposes to offer a motion to concur with an amendment. He can not offer that motion to concur with an amendment to all three of the House amendments at once; he must offer it to one of them. His motion has precedence and must first be dealt with. How are we to first deal with it if all three amendments are before us in a lump and we can not separate them?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, if I may ask the Senator a question, why could not an amendment be made to the general motion to agree by moving to agree to one amendment? I ask the question really in order to hear the Senator's view.

Mr. LODGE. My idea is that any Senator may demand a division of the question. The question is whether we shall agree to the House amendments, and I ask a separate vote—that the questions be decided separately.

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly. I yield for that purpose with great pleasure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Suppose a question is put on disagreement to the first amendment, and suppose the Senate votes "no"; is that, then, an adoption of the amendment?

Mr. LODGE. That would be concurrence in the first amendment, and that would take it out of conference, of course.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Would the Senator say that that would be a concurrence without a vote of the Senate concurring therein? Would the Senator put himself on record in that way?

Mr. LODGE. The motion, of course, would be to concur, which would take precedence at once.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is another question.

Mr. LODGE. How can the Senate refuse to disagree to amendment numbered 1 if all three amendments are tied together? It would then have no opportunity to deal with amendments, which is its undoubted right to do, and the Senate would thereby be deprived of the right to deal with these amendments separately.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. I want to suggest, in the line of the suggestion of the Vice President a moment ago, that anyone who wanted to vote to disagree to one of these amendments would vote to disagree to all of them; that the first two amendments, as I understand, are amendments to the text of a bill which the Senate has already passed.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly they are.

Mr. JONES. I might be glad to vote to concur in those amendments.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. JONES. But the third amendment is an entirely new proposition.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts whether we are not also depriving the House of Representatives of its right? If we should concur in one of these amendments, the House might choose to recede from the others in such an event, but under this action when it goes back to the House the House is compelled to treat the matter as a whole just as we are.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly. I confess that I am a little at a loss for an argument in favor of such a proposition, for I never heard the matter before disputed.

Mr. HARDWICK. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me for a moment?

Mr. LODGE. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. At the same time the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] addressed the Chair the junior Senator from Georgia also addressed the Chair with a preferential motion, which, under the rules of this body and of every other parliamentary body, is entitled to precedence; and it seems to me that some time before this question is determined upon the junior Senator from Georgia is entitled to a ruling on the proposition as to whether or not——

Mr. LODGE. I do not yield the floor.

Mr. HARDWICK (continuing). The motion to concur in the amendments of the House with an amendment does not take precedence of the motion made by the Senator from Florida.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Well, the Senator from Georgia must understand that when a question of order is pending that always takes precedence.

Mr. HARDWICK. Exactly; but the Chair must understand that the Senator from Georgia, too, raised a question of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. But the Senator from Massachusetts raised a question of order first, as the Chair understood.

Mr. HARDWICK. No; I tried to raise it first, Mr. President, and I thought I did.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Trying to do and doing it are different.

Mr. HARDWICK. Well, I thought I did. I submit the proposition—of course if the Chair wants to decide it it is all right—that my motion takes precedence under the rules of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Nobody is disputing that proposition.

Mr. HARDWICK. Then, Mr. President, if that be true, am I not entitled to recognition to make that motion?

Mr. LODGE. I did not mean to yield the floor, for I have not quite concluded.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator from Massachusetts yield to me to submit a point of order to the Chair?

Mr. LODGE. I do not want to yield the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas has requested to be heard.

Mr. LODGE. Of course I yield to the Senator from Arkansas if it will not take me off the floor.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I wish to ask the Chair, for my understanding of the matter, the Senator from Florida having made a motion to disagree en bloc to the three amendments, would an amendment to either of the three propositions involved be in order? The Senator from Florida having moved to disagree to all the amendments en bloc, would it be in order to offer an amendment before that general question is put?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has not any doubt about the right to amend. The Chair has not the slightest doubt about the right of the Senator from Georgia to move to concur with an amendment when we can get to it, but the Senator from Massachusetts has raised a point of order.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. What I wanted to clear up was just exactly what the Chair has held, because that will have a bearing as to how I am going to vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has held that a motion to disagree is radically different from a motion to concur. If it were a motion to concur in the amendments, then it would be a divisible question, but the question of disagreeing is not divisible, for the reason that every Senator who wanted to agree to any single amendment would vote "no."

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is all right so far as it goes, but, pending a vote on the motion of the Senator from Florida, would it be in order to move to amend any one of the particular propositions involved in his motion? I can bring to the attention of the Chair a little more definitely the inquiry I submit by reading from Jefferson's Manual, page 127, under the heading:

> 1st. To agree. } Either of these concludes the other necessarily,
> 2d. To disagree. } for the positive of either is exactly the equivalent of the negative of the other, and no other alternative remains. On either motion amendments to the amendment may be proposed.

If the Chair holds that these three propositions are open to amendment before the final vote to disagree is submitted, I can see no ground for disagreement with the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has not the slightest doubt in the world that the Senator from Georgia can move to amend the motion of the Senator from Florida by moving to concur in whatever he wants to concur in, or do anything else that he pleases about it. There is not any doubt about that.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if I may resume the floor——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I desire to submit a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think under Rule XXIX this whole proceeding is out of order. The third paragraph of that rule is as follows:

> 3. Every bill and joint resolution introduced on leave or reported from a committee, and all bills and joint resolutions received from the House of Representatives, and all reports of committees, shall be printed, unless, for the dispatch of the business of the Senate, such printing may be dispensed with.

Now, Mr. President, I make the point of order that until that is dispensed with by order of the Senate, this whole proceeding is out of order, and that the printing of the bill is the only thing that is in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What is the rule?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Rule XXIX.

Mr. FLETCHER. It can be disposed of by taking action on it without printing.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, we have before us a bill very largely amended, and it is not possible for Senators to tell from the discussion what particular issue is before the Senate. It is a case preeminently in which we are entitled to have the bill printed, so as to be able to judge what is before the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. This is a Senate bill, which has been duly printed, passed, enrolled, and sent to the House. It has duly passed the House and has come back here. It is not an original bill that needs to be printed under this rule, nor is it a House bill.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should be glad——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Just a moment. We are getting too many points of order here.

Mr. LODGE. I was going to suggest that I should like to have my point of order disposed of first.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks that the point of order of the Senator from Massachusetts should be disposed of, and then the Chair will rule on the point of order of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I simply desire to conclude what I was saying.

I am unable to draw the distinction between the motion to concur and the motion to disagree which the Chair draws. Here we have a motion, which admittedly covers three or four distinct subjects, and I ask, acting under Rule XVIII, to have those subjects divided. I do not see how it is possible to deal with them otherwise. That is my request—that they be divided. The Chair holds that that request is out of order; that I have no right to have those subjects divided; and from that decision I respectfully appeal.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. OLIVER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], who is absent. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. RANSDELL (when Mr. THORNTON'S name was called). The senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] is absent on account of sickness. He is paired for the day with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WEEKS. I think I should announce on behalf of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] that he is paired until 6 o'clock this afternoon with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON].

Mr. LEA of Tennessee (after having voted in the affirmative). I inquire if the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I have a general pair with that Senator, and in his absence I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 46, nays 43, as follows:

So Mr. LODGE'S appeal from the decision of the Chair was laid on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the point of order made by the Senator from Nebraska, this is the rule:

> Every bill and joint resolution introduced on leave or reported from a committee, and all bills and joint resolutions received from the House of Representatives, and all reports of committees, shall be printed, unless, for the dispatch of the business of the Senate, such printing may be dispensed with.

The rule does not state how the printing is to be dispensed with. The Chair believes the fair construction of the rule is that there must be a seasonable objection to the consideration of a bill unprinted by the Senate. The Chair does not believe that the Senator from Nebraska has made a seasonable request for the printing of the bill, and the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, the Chair will call to mind the fact that I made several attempts to get the floor for that purpose. Certainly any objection can be made whenever the fact arises that the Senate is in doubt as to what is before the Senate. It has become very obvious that this is a case preeminently requiring that the bill be printed for the information of Senators, so as to enable them to vote intelligently. Here is a bill that did not pass the House of Representatives until——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair can only say that the Chair recognized the Senator from Nebraska as soon as it was possible to do so. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] was holding the floor.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Can the Chair advise the Senate why an objection at any time before the matter comes to a vote is not in order as a point of order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has ruled, and an appeal may be taken from the ruling of the Chair. The Chair has ruled that it is the uniform custom here, when a bill comes over, to lay it down, and if there is not a request for printing it is taken up and considered. The proceeding here certainly did go forward for at least 15 or 20 minutes before the Senator from Nebraska rose. That is certainly true. It is only the opinion of the Chair, not binding on the Senate, as to whether or not the request was made seasonably. The Chair thinks it was not.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Regular order!

Mr. FLETCHER. Not only that, but under paragraph 6 of Rule VII the Chair could lay down this bill at any time, and it supersedes all other business.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do not doubt that it is properly before the Senate; but the point I am making is that, unless the consent of the Senate is given, the objection of any Senator is sufficient to keep this rule in force and call for the printing of the bill.

Mr. SHIVELY. Regular order!

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The very reason for printing the bill is for the information of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has not any doubt about that.

Mr. REED. Regular order!

Mr. HARDWICK, Mr. LODGE, and Mr. FLETCHER addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any appeal from the ruling of the Chair? [A pause.] The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARDWICK. I offer the motion which I send to the desk.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment, simply to make a request?

Mr. HARDWICK. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the bill may be printed, not to delay anything here, but that it may be printed while the debate goes on, unless the Senators on the other side are unwilling that we shall see it.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. LODGE. We can get it, of course, in another form, but it is a very awkward form, and I ask that the bill may be printed.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask that the bill may be printed in such form as to show the amendments of the House.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The Senator from Georgia offers a motion, which will be stated by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Georgia moves to concur in the amendments of the House with an amendment, as follows:

> Add to section 17 of the bill as amended by the House the following: "Provided, That none of the vessels purchased or constructed under the provisions of sections 5 to 15, inclusive, of the bill shall be operated or used in the manner or for the purposes prescribed in section 1 of the bill."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida moves to lay the amendment on the table. [Putting the question.] By the sound the ayes appear to have it.

Mr. HARDWICK. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. RANSDELL (when Mr. THORNTON'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. THORNTON] is unavoidably absent on account of sickness. He is paired for the day with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] on account of illness.

The result was announced—yeas 47, nays 43, as follows:

So Mr. HARDWICK's amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We are proceeding on the theory that a great emergency confronts this country. That has been the reason for introducing this bill. It was the reason alleged for drafting it. It has been the reason alleged for enforcing it upon the attention of Congress. I desire to say a few words upon this so-called emergency.

The facts are that there was an emergency last August, and there was some emergency last September, but that emergency has passed away. In August there was, it is true, a balance of trade against the United States of $19,400,000. In the month of September that balance of trade had changed to $15,000,000 in favor of the United States. In October that balance in our favor increased to $57,000,000. In November it increased to $79,000,000 in favor of the United States. In December it was $131,000,000; in January it was still more; and for the month of February it will probably approximate $150,000,000. In the face of these enormous exports of our products, what pretense do the champions of this bill make that an emergency confronts the country?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask the Senator if he denies that there are products waiting at our ports seeking shipment which can not secure transportation because of the absence of ships? Does the Senator deny that, in the face of reports from every port on the Pacific coast, the Gulf coast, and the Atlantic coast?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from Nebraska affirms that at the present time the enormous exports of the United States are almost unprecedented.

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely; but what would they be if we had the ships to take them?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And there are evidently enough ships to take them, as I shall show the Senator.

Take the exports of wheat at the present time. They aggregate almost 10,000,000 bushels a week. Within four weeks there will not be another bushel of surplus wheat in the United States to export.

Take the exports of corn. Week before last the exports of corn were 1,600,000 bushels. For the 31 weeks closing at that time they were over 12,000,000 bushels. What were they for the corresponding 31 weeks a year ago? They were less than 1,800,000 bushels.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the Senator state the rates on that export?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. How can Senators claim, in the face of these enormous exports of the grains of the West and in the face also of the enormous exports of the cotton of the South, that any emergency confronts the country?

How fast is cotton going out of this country at the present time? It is going out of the country at the rate of about 400,000 bales a week, an unprecedented export of cotton for this season of the year. In January our cotton exports were 320,000 bales larger than for January of last year. The gain this month will be at least as great.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is not that due to the fact that the exports of cotton usually are made long before this season of the year? Is it not true that during September, October, November, and December it was practically impossible to accomplish any considerable export and is not the present large export, as compared to the corresponding season in other years, due to the fact that there was so very little cotton exported during the four months of usual export?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Very probably; but if these exports are enormous now, if they are without a precedent now, how can Senators with a straight face say that an emergency now exists and that we have not enough vessels to carry our goods abroad? Here are the cotton exports by months:

	Bales.
September	125,778
October	479,132
November	760,929
December	1,202,115
January, 1915	1,372,175

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I do.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska if he does not consider that when the shipping companies have increased their rates from 700 to 1,000 per cent an emergency does exist to relieve that situation?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is the only answer which can be made. That question is also suggested by the Senator from Florida, and I will answer it squarely by saying that those freight rates are not being paid by the people of the United States. They are being paid by the people of Europe who are consuming our goods. This is proven by the fact that the cost of living in Great Britain has increased nearly 20 per cent. It is proven by the fact that the cost of bread in Great Britain has doubled. The fact that Europe is paying and that we are not paying these freight rates is shown by the fact that our producers in the West at least have rarely if ever in the history of the country received such enormous prices as they are receiving at the present time. It is the consumer who pays the freight.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Let me also suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that it is not true also, and I call attention to this circumstance: The freight from Galveston on cotton to Liverpool is $1.25 a hundred as against about 85 cents in normal times. The excessive freight rates are charged from that port to the German ports where ships can not go.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is very true, and this is true: The United States is the great producer of the things that Europe must have in this emergency. We need not worry about their means of getting them. That is up to Europe. Europe has got to save the lives of her people. Europe has got to have the things that we produce, as ours is practically the only country in the world that she can look to at the present time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to Rule XXII.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska has the floor.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska has the floor under the rule.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the Senator allow me to move that the unfinished business be laid aside to take up the pending matter?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I should like to continue my address, which is upon the pending bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from Nebraska kindly yield to me for one moment to call attention to the fact that on the calendar as it is printed I gave notice some days ago that at the conclusion of the morning business to-day I would address the Senate on the matters before us? I simply do not want to be crowded off entirely.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the rule of the Senate to be that when a Senator has the floor at the hour of 2 o'clock and the unfinished business is laid before the Senate it does not take the Senator off the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. No, Mr. President, I agree to that entirely. I merely wanted to call attention to the circumstance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair also understands that there has been a custom of giving notice, which has been always kept by the Senate, and it will be kept by the present presiding officer until the Senate otherwise rules.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I wish in connection with what I have said about the existence of an emergency to have inserted in my remarks, without reading, an extract from the New Republic showing the enormous amount of new shipping now being constructed and under contract and under negotiation in the shipyards of the United States. I desire to insert it for the purpose of showing that the merchant marine is being rapidly built up in the United States without the extraordinary proposal that is now before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

The most remarkable change since the time of the Napoleonic wars has come suddenly in the American shipbuilding industry. The last day of December, 1914, closed one of the poorest years the American shipyards have had in a decade. To-day every shipbuilding concern, from Bath, in Maine, down to Newport News, in Virginia, is working to its fullest capacity. One of the largest companies has orders sufficient to keep 6,000 men employed full time for from two to three years. Contracts have been closed for 48 ocean vessels and negotiations are pending for 60 more. Prices have been advanced 15 per cent, although that fact is not significant. A British company has placed an order for the building of two ships in an American yard, a thing never heard of before, and is likely to order two more. Apparently the American merchant marine has entered upon another period of expansion. The ships ordered and those for which marine architects are now drawing plans embrace not only passenger vessels for the coastwise trade but freighters for the Pacific and South American service, big cargo carriers for the trans-Atlantic business, and oil tankers to go anywhere and everywhere.

There are six great shipyards on our Atlantic coast and three of lesser size. The six great ones are the Cramp yards, at Philadelphia; the Newport News shipbuilding plant, at Newport News, Va.; the Sparrow Point establishment of the Maryland Steel Co., at Sparrow Point, Md.; the Harlan & Hollingsworth yards, at Wilmington, Del.; the New York Shipbuilding Co.'s works, at Camden, N. J.; and those of the Fore River Co., at Quincy, Mass., owned by the Bethlehem Steel Co. The three minor ones are the Bath Iron Works, at Bath, Me.; the Staten Island Shipbuilding Co., at Port Richmond, Staten Island; and the Skinner Shipbuilding Co., at Baltimore.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Nebraska a question?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. ROOT. With reference to the alleged exigency arising from the increase of freight rates, is it not a fact that the increase of freight rates proceeds chiefly from two causes, neither of which can be cured by additional ships—one cause, that the deficiency in dock room, lighterage service, stevedores, and storage accommodations on the other side of the Atlantic require that the vessels carrying cargoes from America to Europe take long periods before they can be discharged, so that it requires at least on an average twice as long for a vessel to make a round trip now as it does under ordinary circumstances——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH in the chair). Does the Senator from New York——

Mr. ROOT. Not at present. I will not yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri raises a point of order.

Mr. REED. I make the point of order that both the Senator from New York and the Senator from Nebraska can not hold the floor at the same time, and can not be permitted under the rule.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I am asking a question of the Senator from Nebraska in accordance with the rules of the Senate.

Mr. REED. But, Mr. President——

Mr. ROOT. And I submit that if the Senator from Nebraska and the Senator from New York can not hold the floor at the same time, it is quite manifest that the Senator from Missouri can not hold the floor at the same time with them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair feels——

Mr. REED. I make the point of order that the Senator from New York is not asking a question, and that if he is professing to ask a question he is manifestly abusing the privilege, and I insist upon my point of order.

Mr ROOT. The Senator from New York is not abusing a privilege. He would not abuse anything, even the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President; the Senator from New York would have his hands reasonably full if he undertook it.

Mr. WEEKS and others. Regular order!

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair overrules the point of order. The Senator from New York will state his question.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I will proceed with the statement of the question. Is it not the true cause of the increased freight rates that there is a very great and general deficiency of return cargoes from Europe to America, so that the eastbound cargoes have to pay a far greater proportion of the upkeep and operation of the vessel than under ordinary circumstances?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Undoubtedly the causes stated by the Senator from New York and some other causes have entered into the increase of the freight rates which have resulted since the war.

Mr. President, it may be said, furthermore, that in normal times transoceanic freight rates are so low that it has become notorious that American vessels flying the American flag and operating under American law are scarcely able to pay their operating expenses, let alone the consideration of making any profits. Present conditions are unusual and can not last long. Rates are already coming down.

Mr. President, it was not my purpose when I rose to discuss at any length this particular feature of the bill.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I yield for a question.

Mr. WEEKS. I wanted to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question which was suggested by a comment made that in four weeks the grain which we have for export will have been exported. It occurs to me to suggest that I noticed in the Boston papers this morning that the elevators in Boston only contain five-sevenths of their capacity in grain for foreign shipments at this time, but, further—and this was suggested by the Senator from Georgia about cotton—that there were last week exported 398,000 bales of cotton against 142,000 last year in the corresponding week, and 113,000 bales the year before in the corresponding week, and that the visible supply of cotton at shipping ports is less than 800,000 bales——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I make the point of order——

Mr. WEEKS. And therefore that the increase——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri will state his point of order.

Mr. REED. The point of order is that the Senator from Massachusetts is not asking a question, but, under the guise of a form of a question, is proceeding to make a speech.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair rules that the point of order is not sustained; but the Chair takes this occasion to state that if, under the guise of a question addressed to a Senator who holds the floor, the Senator interrupting takes opportunity to make a speech rather than to address a question, the Chair will rule that the Senator who has the floor has lost it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Under those circumstances I shall request not to be interrupted. I have not much to say, but I do not want to imperil my chance to say what little I still have to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair thinks it well to admonish Senators who have the floor that they will interrupt and recall the privilege whenever it appears that it is being used for the purpose of addressing the Senate rather than asking a question of the Senator who holds the floor.

Mr. WEEKS. I can finish my question in a word, and it would have been finished some time before if I had not been interrupted. The question is: If, with the visible supply of cotton in port, in shipping ports, the same statement made by the Senator from Nebraska as to grain would not apply to cotton, and in four weeks' time the cotton we have for export substantially would have been shipped?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The statement is undoubtedly justified.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I inquire of the Senator from Nebraska if he does not think there are other articles—articles of manufacture and from the farms and the mines of the country—besides cotton?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator will permit me, I do not propose to speak particularly of each one of those articles of export, but I desire to impress the Senate with the fact that no review of our exports can be made to show that we confront an emergency by present lack of shipping facilities. I do propose, however, to show that we do confront another emergency, and I propose to offer an amendment to the pending bill to meet that emergency. I would like to offer it now and have the opportunity to discuss it thereafter, but because of the fact that the Senator from Florida has adopted the policy of moving to table all amendments as soon as offered, without any discussion, I am compelled now to make my discussion first and offer my amendment afterwards.

My amendment to the shipping bill is in the form of a measure which I introduced known as a bill to prohibit the exportation from the United States of arms and artillery ammunition to any country at war with any country with which the United States is at peace.

Mr. President, a real emergency exists here; a real reason for immediate action of Congress exists. Various sapient editors have declared that my bill to prohibit the exportation of arms and ammunition is an attempt to change international law. It is not. International law would not be affected.

Under international law any citizen of a neutral country has the right to sell arms and ammunition to a belligerent country, but it is also true that any country has the right to prohibit its citizens at any time from doing that thing which they have the right to do under international law.

What is the international law concerning the exportation of arms and ammunition? It is simply this: That whereas any citizen who is engaged in legitimate, peaceful trade will be protected by the flag of his country and by the Government of his country, yet if he undertakes to sell arms and ammunition to one of the belligerents, he does so at his own risk; his country withdraws its protection from him; he must take the chance; and it is regarded as traffic which his Nation will not protect him in.

International law, however, is entirely out of harmony with the spirit of the age in permitting this traffic even on those conditions; it is archaic; it relates to a time and it has its roots in an age when war was the legitimate method of settling international disputes. It goes back a hundred years and more to a time when nations settled all their differences practically by a resort to arms.

Mr. President, since that time a great change has come over the world. The United States has led in the idea of peace. The United States has taken the lead of all the countries of the world in declaring that war is not the proper arbitrament of international disputes. The United States has concluded arbitration treaties with some 26 nations of the world, and even although those treaties do not cover certain excepted subjects the United States has gone further and entered into treaties with all the countries of the world, practically agreeing to submit every question of every sort to the consideration of a commission and allowing one year, at least, during which the Nation will take no action until that commission has had time to report.

The peace sentiment in the United States has grown to such an extent that war is regarded as a horrible, unjustifiable, and disgraceful breach of civilization. The peace sentiment in the United States has gone so far as to restrain the Government itself from participating in war. Yet while we have made that enormous step forward and taken that great advance in the direction of international peace, we have still permitted our citizens, practically speaking, to take part in a war in which we have absolutely no interest.

So I say that the archaic condition of international law justifies us in enacting a statute to prohibit our citizens from doing that thing which international law permits them to do at their peril.

But I am told that while this is all right in theory, and while it is all right in principle to prohibit our citizens from manufacturing and selling the deadly weapons of destruction to nations engaged in a war, yet we must not make this reform in time of war. It is said that we must not pass this statute while the war is in progress; we must wait until it is over before we enter upon the reform; we must wait until the building is burned down before we take the step against the fire.

Mr. President, able editors in America and abroad have declared that it would be an unneutral act for the Congress of the United States in the midst of this war to pass this act to restrain its citizens from taking part in it. Mr. President, I deny that proposition and I desire to meet it squarely.

What are the real facts in the United States to-day? While the President of the United States has issued a neutrality proclamation, while he has declared that the Government of the United States is neutral in this awful struggle now progressing in Europe, and while the Government, under the President's guidance, has remained neutral, great interests in the United States have gone to war. Perhaps 100 arms and ammunition factories are running night and day. They are manufacturers of shot and shell, of shrapnel and bullets, and of all the other methods of destroying life. They are spending vast sums of money in enlarging their institutions. They have even brought over here from other lands foreign officials and army officers to act as inspectors in the factories to see that these arms, artillery, and ammunition are manufactured with a sufficiently deadly efficiency.

Our great bankers have joined in financing this manufacture. Our great financiers are advancing hundreds of millions of dollars to the warring nations to buy these deadly weapons to carry on war. What becomes of our neutrality? It is a farce. I ask, Mr. President, what becomes of the President's proclamation that no man by act or deed shall do anything to violate the spirit of neutrality? Is it right for us to tolerate the condition which has resulted practically in these vast interests becoming the supply of warring nations? Is it right for our great industries to become the ordnance department of nations engaged in this conflict?

Those are the facts, Mr. President. Hundreds of millions of dollars of the war's most destructive weapons are being made in the United States, and tens of thousands of people are being maimed and killed by weapons made by manufacturers in our country, financed by our bankers, and defended by some of our great newspapers, I am sorry to say.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Just for a question.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator if he has any statistics showing the extent of the shipment of arms and ammunition out of this country since the war commenced.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I will, with the consent of the Senate, insert those in the RECORD, Mr. President, if I can procure them, which is doubtful, as official records are lacking.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, leave will be granted.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Now, Mr. President, what do our friends, the former advocates of peace, say to the proposition that this great war, which may last years, may be used to build up in the United States a Kruppism, a system for the manufacture of arms and ammunition greater than any which exists in Europe? Is it going to be for the ultimate benefit of the United States to encourage the investment of millions of dollars in the enlargement of these institutions for the manufacture of armor, artillery, and munitions of war of all sorts? Is it not one of the very dangers that we are seeking to avoid? In our path of peace the policy of the United States is to avoid the development of a great war interest, and yet Senators and gentlemen come forward and say that we should not put any check upon the enlargement of these plants, we should not throw anything in the way, but permit them to sell their hundreds of millions of dollars of destructive weapons to the warring nations of Europe.

Mr. President, let me come to the issue. Is it an act of unneutrality in the midst of war for the United States to prohibit its citizens from selling arms and ammunition manufactured in this country to belligerent nations that are making war upon nations with which we are at peace? The argument that this is so is made upon this theory, that one of the great sides to this horrible war has succeeded in getting command of the sea; that it is solely able to draw upon our great resources and to purchase our arms and ammunition; and that to pass this act at this time would be to withdraw from it the benefit which it enjoys and the advantage which it has gained.

Mr. President, this is not very material, but it seems to me the mere statement of those facts but adds another reason why this reform should be made and why the bill I have brought forward should be passed. If it is true that the business and banking interests of the United States, with our great resources, are participating in this war on one side only, that furnishes another argument why the practice should be stopped. That of itself is an unneutral condition. That of itself is abandoning an impartial position. If both sides were able to buy from us freely, we might stand at least consistent in our bloody traffic before the eyes of the world and say we are taking no part with one side or the other.

But, Mr. President, even that is but a subordinate question. The argument which is advanced against the measure most effectively is that to pass the law now in the midst of war would be an unneutral act. Was it an unneutral act when Italy put a stop to the exportation of arms and ammunition after the war began? Was it an unneutral act when Holland put a stop to the exportation of arms and ammunition and other contraband after the war began? Was it an unneutral act for Denmark to do it, and Sweden to do it, and Norway to do it, and Switzerland to do it? All those nations have passed such acts or entered the proper decree since the war began. And has it come to this, that the United States is the only nation in the world which is prohibited from doing what every other neutral nation in the world may do?

It can not be said in answer that our position geographically is such as to make it improper for us to do what it is proper for them to do, because several of those nations are so situated that they would only be in a position to sell arms and ammunition to one of the belligerent countries. Yet no claim is made that their prohibition of exportation is unneutral.

Mr. President, the fact is that to prohibit the exportation of arms and ammunition by any country is, and always has been, considered to be a purely domestic matter. It is none of the affairs of other countries what laws we pass concerning our exports or our imports.

There is a very good illustration of this which exists in the case which has been cited in the controversy between Great Britain and Germany in 1870. The fact was that by the act of 1853 the British Parliament authorized the British Government at any time to lay an embargo on the exportation of arms and ammunition. When the Franco-Prussian War came on in 1870, and the exportation of arms and ammunition began to go to France from Great Britain, Germany applied to Great Britain and asked to have that act of Parliament put into effect. The British Government replied:

It is true the Parliament has authorized us to put an embargo on the exportation of arms and ammunition, but no other country has any right to ask it or has any standing to expect it from us. It is a purely municipal and domestic matter. We put it on or we leave it off, in accordance with the interests of our own people.

That substantially was the answer of Lord Grenville when the German ambassador requested, as a friendly act of Great Britain, that they put a stop under the act of Parliament to the exportation of arms and ammunition to France.

Mr. President, the corollary of that is true. If it was a purely domestic matter for Great Britain to refuse to put the embargo on, it would be a purely domestic matter for the United States to put the embargo on; and just as no country could ask for it, so no country could object to it. If that is true of Great Britain, it is true of the United States.

But, Mr. President, I am afraid that we have become hardened to this war. When it first broke out a tremor of horror passed over the whole world. It was so awful in its dimensions, so terrible in its possibilities that humanity stood aghast; but as the weeks have gone by, we have become accustomed to the enormity of the proceeding. When it first broke out, when the first clash of arms occurred, it seemed to be a reality to us; our imaginations were keen and alive to the awful details of what was going on. We could see the brother bid farewell to his sister; we could see the son kissing his mother perhaps the last farewell; we could fairly hear the wailing of those who were left at home, as the fathers and brothers and sons went out by the hundred thousand to that awful conflict. Yes; and when the clash of battle occurred, there was a bloodcurdling horror which seized upon us. We could hear the groans of the dying; we could fairly see the writhing of the tens of thousands of maimed; and when the battle was over, we could see the field strewn with the tens of thousands of dead soldiers, their bodies lying there as mute and horrible evidences of the awfulness of war. We could see their glassy eyes gazing up into an unanswering heaven; and we then realized in those days when the war was young what an awful crime was being committed against humanity and against civilization. But now we have become hardened to it. We pick up our daily papers and read with seeming indifference the awful tragedy of civilization that is in progress—yes, the awful wreck of Christianity that is being wrought. We permit our factories to grind away their awful product to make widows and orphans and misery and wailing across the water.

I say, Mr. President, it is time this country again awakened to the fact that we have a responsibility to share in what is going on; and I may say, by way of interruption to myself at this time, that I believe the time is at hand when the United States should lead the neutral nations of the world and take aggressive steps to bring this war to a close.

The time has come to assert neutral rights and not to permit, under the archaic laws of neutrality, the belligerents to monopolize the whole world. In the name of humanity, in the name of civilization, in the name of Christianity, the neutral nations of the world have a right and, I believe, have a duty to do something aggressive and radical toward putting a stop to this horror of the ages. But we can not do it, Mr. President, so long as a large number of our own citizens and hundreds of millions of our own wealth are practically involved in the war, are participating in it, are gaining from it. We are not in a neutral position; we are not in a strong position; we are not in a consistent position.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. For a question only.

Mr. JONES. Does the Senator from Nebraska think that we would strengthen our position by having ships owned by the Government carrying some of these munitions of war across to some belligerent country?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think that would probably be the climax if that should be undertaken.

Mr. President, I said that this proposition to stop this horrid traffic is purely a domestic question. It is purely a question which interests the United States, and we ought to consider this bill to prohibit the exportation of arms and ammunition from the standpoint of the interests of the American people and under the guidance of the American conscience. Even if it be conceded that some neutral countries can properly permit their citizens to engage in the horrible traffic of supplying the belligerents with arms and ammunition, the United States is not in that position.

The United States is a composite country. Into the make-up of the United States come the citizens of all countries in the world. It is not possible for war of any extent to break out without arousing the prejudices and the sympathies of a large share of our own population. We have in the United States more than 13,000,000 people who were born across the ocean; we have probably 30,000,000 out of our ninety-odd million population who are either of European birth or whose parents were of European birth. It is not, therefore, possible for a great war like this to rage in Europe without involving the sympathies and the prejudices of those people.

Now, here is the domestic question. Possibly a country like Spain, inhabited by a homogeneous people, might supply one belligerent or either belligerent without arousing any local disturbances or creating any local hate; but when the United States permits its citizens, its great manufacturers, its powerful trusts, its great banks, its great bond sellers, to participate in a war, it arouses to a dangerous degree the hates and the racial discords that will rage here for years to come.

Every German newspaper printed in the United States day after day contains column after column of the names of German soldiers who have been wounded or killed. Those papers are bought by the hundred thousand and scanned eagerly by our American fellow citizens to learn whether any of their cousins or brothers or uncles or fathers have been killed in the war. Do you think those millions of people who are anxiously scanning that news are going to view with equanimity a policy which permits our great manufacturers of arms and ammunition to sell them to the belligerents of Europe to do the killing?

Why, we have already seen in this country, Mr. President, what it means. It means that, by permitting this traffic, we are arraying citizen against citizen, race against race; and while a few months ago there was a friendly feeling between all of the various stocks which have come from Europe, where German and Bohemian and Pole and Russian and Swede and Englishman and Frenchman all lived together in comparative peace and harmony, there is developing in this country at the present time a tendency which threatens to disintegrate our population into the different races; which threatens to array race against race in the United States.

I say the fact that we are in such a position, the fact that we have such a heterogeneous population, the fact that we have the sons of so many European countries in our own midst, is a reason why we, at least, above all the nations in the world, should keep out of any entanglements in time of war. We should carry the policy of abstention to the limit; we should not permit any of our citizens to manufacture the weapons that will certainly bring woe and misery to so many of our own citizens. We can not justify ourselves by adhering to the ancient, archaic international law, which permitted a citizen at his own peril to supply a belligerent country with the weapons of death.

Mr. President, instead of it being an improper time to pass the law which I propose and which I intend to offer as an amendment to the pending bill, I think that, so far from being an improper time to pass such a law, it is preeminently the right time. An emergency exists, Senators. I have said there was no emergency which justified haste in the pending shipping bill, but there is an emergency on this issue. This matter is getting worse every week that passes.

I am not a partisan in the war. My ancestors on the one side came from England and on the other side from France. I was born in this country, and to some slight extent educated in Germany, but I have no friendships and no sympathies on either side. I simply stand for the United States; I stand for our national integrity and the American flag. I believe the United States should put a stop to this horrible traffic, not because of the effect it may have upon the European war, but because of the effect that it is having among our own people, the effect that it is having and has had for months in stirring up hate, in arousing prejudices, in destroying neutrality, and in dissipating the American spirit, which before the war was welding us into a common people.

So, Mr. President, when the proper time comes I shall offer my bill to stop the exportation of arms as an amendment to the pending measure.

Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. NORRIS, and Mr. FLETCHER addressed the Chair.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nebraska yield before he closes——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. If the Senator from Florida will pardon the Chair, the courtesy of the Senate is due to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], but the Chair understands the Senator from Florida desires to move to lay aside the unfinished business and take up the measure which came over from the House of Representatives, and it occurred to the Chair that that would be more appropriate for the address which the Senator from New Hampshire desires to make.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; I desire to address myself to the unfinished business.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to address an inquiry to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], who had the floor. I am not seeking the floor myself. The other Senators are seeking the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida has been recognized.

Mr. NORRIS. How can the Chair recognize the Senator from Florida before the Senator from Nebraska has yielded?

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator from Nebraska had yielded the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think so. At least I addressed him before he had taken his seat.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair assumes that the Senator from Florida will yield to the Senator from Nebraska to ask a question.

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I can ask the question of my colleague, the Senator from Nebraska, privately. If I am not entitled to it as a right, I do not ask it; but I do not understand how one Senator can take the floor from another without his consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to say that he had recognized the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] before any intimation came from the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] that he had any desire to take the floor. He can have the floor now by permission of the Senator from Florida, and the Senator from Florida signifies that he is quite willing to yield that courtesy to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. That is not the point I was making.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Very well; the Senator from Florida has the floor.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I move to lay aside the unfinished business, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 5259) to establish one or more United States Navy mail lines between the United States and South America and between the United States and the countries of Europe.

Mr. GALLINGER. That being a debatable question, I will proceed.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays are asked for. Is the demand seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. The question is on proceeding to the consideration of Senate bill 5259.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in accordance with the notice that I gave some days ago that I would address myself to-day to the shipping question, I desire to do so at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask for order in the Chamber——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will preserve order.

Mr. SMOOT. And also in the galleries.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks it is due to the Senator from New Hampshire that order should be preserved.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have heretofore called attention to the fact that the shipping bill has had a kaleidoscopic experience, changing from day to day, so that it has been almost impossible to keep track of what is happening. The subject under discussion now relates to the attempt on the part of the promoters of the bill to change the rules of the Senate in an irregular way so as to bring about a termination of debate by arbitrary methods. Efforts to enforce cloture in the Senate have been tried several times in the history of the Government, to which I desire to call attention before taking up the real questions relating to the purchase and construction of ships, as provided for in the bill which has to-day come from the other House.

The most remarkable speech made in opposition to cloture was by Senator Cockrell, of Missouri, in 1891, to which speech I am indebted for many facts which I will present. I call attention, Mr. President, to the fact that that speech of the then Senator from Missouri, who fortunately is still with us, is found on page 1686 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of January 22, 1891.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire will desist until order is restored in the Chamber.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will say, parenthetically, that I do not expect much of an audience to-day, because Senators are not paying much attention to this subject when it is being debated, but I think that conversation ought to be held in the cloakrooms or in the corridors rather than in the Senate Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is due to the Senator as well as to the Senate that the suggestion should be followed.

Mr. GALLINGER. It will be recalled, Mr. President, that from 1798 to 1806 the previous question was a part of the rules of the Senate, during which time it was used only on three occasions. In 1806 it was dropped out of the rules, and the several motions enumerated in Rule XXII of our present code were the only motions that could be made during the pendency of a question, to wit:

1. To adjourn.
2. To adjourn to a day certain, or that when the Senate adjourn it shall be to a day certain.
3. To take a recess.
4. To proceed to a consideration of executive business.
5. To lay on the table.
6. To postpone indefinitely.
7. To postpone to a day certain.
8. To commit.
9. To amend.

Which several motions shall have precedence as they stand arranged.

This absolutely settles the controversy as to whether or not the previous question can be resorted to in the Senate. It is absolutely and unqualifiedly forbidden by our rules. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] insists that it can be used because general parliamentary law sanctions it, and on yesterday he went to the extent of saying that it was included in Jefferson's Manual, which was a part of the rules of the Senate. It is proper to observe that Jefferson's Manual has never been made a part of the rules of the Senate. The House of Representatives has adopted Jefferson's Manual, but the Senate has never done so. There are so many rules in Jefferson's Manual in conflict with the rules of the Senate that it is absurd to claim that it is a part of our rules. As an illustration, Jefferson's Manual, on page 92, says, "In the Senate of the United States the President's decision is without appeal," which we all know is not a correct statement, and there are multitudes of other so-called rules in Jefferson's Manual that are in open conflict with the code of rules which the Senate has adopted for its guidance.

From 1806 to 1841 no effort was made to effect a cloture by the use of the previous question or any other similar parliamentary device. In that year Senator Clay, of Kentucky, attempted it. Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, in his Instructions to the Youth of the Country, says:

An attempt was made by Mr. Clay during the Presidency of John Tyler to introduce the "hour rule" and the previous question into the Senate. The Democratic minority threatened forcible resistance. Some of Mr. Clay's principal friends flinched from his support and the plan was given up.

During that controversy Senator Clay had a spirited debate with Senator Silas Wright, of New York, who strongly opposed the proposition.

In this connection it may be interesting to quote what two distinguished Senators from Missouri said on the subject. Mr. Benton used, in substance, the following words:

I will take this opportunity to say a word on this menace, so often thrown out, of a design to stifle debate and stop amendments to bills in this Chamber. I consider such an attempt as much a violation of the Constitution and of the privileges of the Chamber as it would be for a military usurper to enter upon us at the head of his soldiery and expel us from our seats.

Senator Benton continued:

The previous question and the old sedition law are measures of the same character and children of the same parents and intended for the same purposes. They are to hide light, to enable those in power to work in darkness, to enable them to proceed unmolested, and to permit them to establish ruinous measures without stint and without detection. The introduction of this previous question into this body I shall resist as I would resist its conversion into a bed of justice of the old French monarchy for the registration of royal edicts. In these beds of justice, the Parliament formed into a bed of justice, the kings before the revolution caused their edicts to be registered without debate and without amendment. The King ordered it, and it was done; his word became law. On one occasion, when the Parliament was refractory, Louis XIV entered the chamber, booted and spurred, a whip in his hand, and stood on his feet until the edict was registered. This is what has been done in the way of passing bills without debate or amendment in France.

Senator Benton's colleague, Senator Linn, opposed the measure in the following vigorous language:

Mr. Linn said it was an old Scottish proverb that "threatened people live longest." He hoped the liberties of the Senate would yet outlive the threats of the Senator from Kentucky.

Equally, I hope, Mr. President, that the Senate will outlive the threats of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], uttered a few days ago.

The Senator from Missouri was decidedly sanguinary on that occasion, speaking as follows:

Mr. President, the best that can be said in defense of the filibustering tactics pursued by Senators on the other side is that they are within their technical rights under the letter of the rules. I do not concede that; but I might concede it and take the position, which I do, that the course they are pursuing is so grossly violative of the spirit and intent of the rules that the Senate itself, acting in defense of its own integrity, should observe and enforce the spirit of the rules and stop this outrageous abuse of its power, its rights, and its dignity. In face of the situation as we have it to-day, the presiding officer ought to be—and I hope is—brave and strong enough, despite any outburst of yells and whoops, to direct the Secretary to call the ayes and noes when they have been ordered and thus force the issue to a decision. If he should do that, he would receive the plaudits of the American people, even though the filibusterers might be able to muster a majority to block him.

Continuing, the Senator from Missouri said:

In an emergency like this I believe Democrats, every man of us, should be on the firing line and fight it out at the point of the bayonet. For one, I want the test made, that we may see how many grenadiers of the guard are left.

Mr. President, when a few days ago I called the attention of the Senator from Missouri to that most extraordinary language he said that he had not said that, and I replied that I presumed it was a figure of speech and not intended as it was uttered. But, Mr. President, there have been occasions during the history of the Senate and of our Government when violence has been threatened on the floor of the Senate, when attempts such as are now being made to abridge the freedom of debate have been advocated, and those threats were made by Democrats.

Senator Linn continued:

But if the lash was to be applied, he would rather it was applied at once than to be always threatened with it. There is great complaint of delay; but who was causing the delay now growing out of this threat? Had it not been made, there would be no necessity for repelling it. He knew of no disposition on the part of his friends to consume the time that ought to be given to the public business. He had never known his friends, while in the majority, to complain of discussion. He knew very well and could make allowances that the Senator from Kentucky was placed in a very trying situation. If he brought forward measures that were questionable, he had to encounter resistance. But he was in the predicament that he had pledged himself to carry those measures, and if he did not it would be his political ruin. He had everything on the issue; hence his impatience to pronounce judgment against the right of the minority to discuss his measures.

In 1850 Senator Stephen A. Douglas introduced a resolution providing for the previous question, which, after debate, was laid on the table on motion of Mr. Atchison, and that ended the matter, so far as the effort of Mr. Douglas was concerned.

The next time was on April 4, 1862, when Senator John P. Hale, of New Hampshire, attempted to secure a cloture rule to be operative during the period of the Civil War.

Mr. President, those were trying days in the history of our Government. There were men in the Senate Chamber who opposed legislation relating to the war and did all in their power to prevent the passage of appropriations for the conduct of the war on the Union side. Senator Hale, an original free-soil advocate, impatient at delay, thought the Senate ought to be permitted to vote without much discussion on those great questions, and he offered what is now called a cloture rule. It was in these words:

Resolved, That the Senate may at any time during the present rebellion, by a vote of the majority of the Members present, fix a time when debate on any matter pending before the Senate shall cease and terminate; and the Senate shall, when the time fixed for terminating the debate arrives, proceed to vote without debate on the measure and all amendments pending that may be offered.

Mr. President, opposition developed to that resolution. Senator Davis, of Kentucky, a Democrat, and Senator Collamer, of Vermont, a Republican, vigorously opposed the proposition, and it was abandoned before it was put to a vote.

On March 10, 1870, Senator Hamlin, of Maine, submitted a resolution to close debate, which was couched in a milder form, and on the 25th day of the same month Senator Wilson, of Massachusetts, offered the following order:

That the Select Committee on Rules be instructed to consider the inexpediency of adopting a rule for the remainder of the session, providing that whenever any bill has been considered for two days the question of ordering it to a third reading may be ordered by a two-thirds vote of the Senators present and voting.

That attempt, like other previous ones, failed.

In 1873 Mr. Wright, of Iowa, made a similar attempt, but that also ended in failure. Senators Thurman, of Ohio, and Bayard, of Delaware, opposed the proposition most vigorously, and it was not agreed to. In debating that question Senator Thurman, of Ohio, one of the ablest men who ever occupied a seat in this body, a Democrat of Democrats, used these words:

Sir, begin this in the Senate, curtail debate here in some impatient haste of a majority that can not bear to hear even discussion of questions, in that spirit of despotism that would stop all debate whatsoever, in that spirit that says that deliberative bodies in which public measures are discussed are a nuisance, and that it is best to have no discussion at all—let this first step be taken, and from that very day the decline of the influence of the Senate in this country will begin.

Senator Carpenter, of Wisconsin, one of the ablest lawyers that ever graced this body, opposed the resolution in these words:

I entirely concur with the Senator from Delaware—

That was the great Democratic Senator Bayard, who had previously spoken against the resolution—

I entirely concur with the Senator from Delaware, who has just taken his seat. There ought to be one place in this Government where there can be not only free debate but full debate. There is another body of very honorable men, to which I can not refer, but of which I have heard more or less, of whose doings I have seen some things, where a previous question obtains, and I certainly shall never vote nor give the slightest encouragement by any vote of mine to establish a previous question here.

In 1890 Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, and Senator Aldrich, of Rhode Island, made an effort to secure a cloture rule in some form, but it met with strong Democratic opposition and, like its predecessors, failed.

Against this proposition Senator Gorman, of Maryland, a leading Democrat, made a vigorous protest, using the following language:

We are taking a step which, in my judgment, overturns the whole history of this body. The measure itself comes before the body under most peculiar circumstances. It has been brought here by the decision of the Chair and the vote of the majority of this body in direct opposition to every rule of parliamentary law, both specific, as provided by the rules of the body, and general parliamentary law, and no instance in the history of legislation can be cited where such action has been taken as was taken during this day's session; that is, during the calendar day of yesterday, but of to-day's session, as we only had a recess from 6 o'clock last evening until 11 o'clock this morning.

At that time they were going through pretty much the same procedure that characterized the Senate a few days ago.

Senator Gorman continued:

Mr. President, I do not at this moment propose to characterize the action which has been taken, but it will be, I trust, fully and completely stated, and stated often, for I regard it as one of the most unfortunate pages that will be found in the records of this body, and I believe that the time will come when by an almost unanimous vote we shall follow the action of Congress upon another memorable occasion, when Gen. Jackson by a resolution was condemned, and this body passed an order drawing around that resolution a deep, black line. So I believe the time will come when by common consent of men of all parties we will draw a deep, black line around the Journal of the proceedings of this day.

Good government and orderly conduct of the business of 62,000,000 of people, in my judgment, are involved in this proposition. Freedom of speech and all that follows in its wake are to be determined by the resolution now pending. In my judgment, Mr. President—and I speak alone for myself—I think it is the most revolutionary proposition which has ever been presented. I think if it is enacted and we should be bound by it its consequences can not be measured by any man, not to the South but to the North and to the West and to the entire country. It jeopardizes all business interests, in my judgment, and the good conduct of our local governments in all the States of the Union.

Senator Gray, of Delaware, whom we all remember with affection as a Member of this body, who has lately retired from the service of the Government in a judicial capacity, and who graced both this body and the bench, in opposing the proposition used this vigorous language:

Mr. President, it is a matter of sincere regret to me that the debate which ensued upon the resumption of the consideration of the elections bill, and which was proceeding regularly and, I think, for the edification of the Senate—at all events, for the edification of the country—should not have been allowed to proceed uninterruptedly without the interposition of this drastic, rude, violent proposition made by the Senator from Rhode Island in the resolution which is now before the Senate for consideration.

There was no necessity for it. It was a violation of all the precedents that have obtained in this body for a hundred years. Nothing had occurred in this body in the course of the debate upon the elections bill that was any warrant for turning back the current of history, violating American traditions, trespassing upon that liberty of all liberties, the liberty of debate, the freedom of speech, the freedom of speech in this body, as dear and as sacred and as important to the maintenance of our institutions as the freedom of the press, its correlative.

* * * * * * *

It had been debated the year before, as the Senator from Nevada says, and yet you tell us that you must pass this bill in the remaining weeks and in the closing hours of the Fifty-first Congress, even if you have to destroy the liberty of debate in this body and the freedom of speech, which has never been questioned in a hundred years of its glorious history.

How natural that sounds, Mr. President. This bill, like the other, must be passed in the closing hours of Congress. No time is to be given for debate, but we must have a cloture rule to secure the desired result.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator surely does not mean to have it inferred from his statement that there has been no time for debate on this bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, no, Mr. President; the Senator from Ohio has debated it, as well as some of the rest of us.

Senator Gray continued:

Mr. President, I was aware of the fact that this party who propose this violence to free speech were driven to the revolutionary method of suspending and driving out of the House the opposition Members, and I tell the Senator from Rhode Island that he never can hope to succeed in the American Senate with his proposition until he has power to suspend and drive out of it the minority that sits on this side.

* * * * * * *

Why, I know that there never was a proposition made to subjugate a free people, to establish a despotism anywhere, certainly in what are called modern times, that it was not done with high-sounding phrases. This proposition is that when a "reasonable time" has elapsed, and not before—it might have said "and not before," and we would not be better off—shall debate be closed?

When King George wanted to work his will upon his dependent colonists he did not upbraid them and denounce them. He "wanted to subserve the happiness and welfare of his beloved subjects in the Colony of Massachusetts Bay," was the same resounding phrase or preamble of some kind that preceded every act and every manifesto of the tyranny of that king toward this country. It is always so. Wherever absolute power is deposited it is impatient of contradiction, impatient of obstruction. We have been slow in learning that lesson. Human nature is the same to-day that it was a thousand years ago, and we owe our liberties not so much to the increase in intelligence, great as it has been, and the diffusion of knowledge and education, as to the sturdy resistance of those upon whom absolutism was sought to be worked.

It was the resistance of the barons that wrested the charter from King John. It was the resistance of the common people that overthrew the Stuarts. It was the resistance of "embattled farmers" who fired the shot, whose echo "sounded round the world," that overthrew the tyranny of King George. And it will be the resistance of the plain people of America this day and generation that will thwart and destroy and make null all the attempts of any set of men, whether they be a majority or a minority, to control their liberties and destroy their freedom.

Institutions, Mr. President, that have been erected and grown up during all these struggles are what protect freedom and liberty to-day throughout the world wherever they obtain. Benevolence will not do it. Tyrants are benevolent; kings are benevolent; monarchs are amiable. They do not desire the suffering or the unhappiness of their subjects. But will that make you more content, Mr. President, to live under a monarch or a despotism, that the personal character and the disposition and the temper of the monarch are such that in all private contact he is lovely and amiable and attractive? No, Mr. President; we do not hold our liberties upon the reasonableness of the majority.

We do not hold our liberties upon the reasonableness of the majority any more than we hold them upon the good will or benevolence of an individual tyrant. We have surer muniments of freedom than that, and unless we maintain them—and God willing we will maintain them—then we shall lose all they were intended to guard.

Among other things Senator Gray said that the proposition was a violent assault against home rule in the United States, adding:

The measure is obnoxious to every sentiment of American freedom. It must go hand in hand with the alien and sedition laws and with a censorship of the press.

Again, in 1893, the Senator from Connecticut, Mr. Platt, introduced an amendment to Rule IX, which in effect established a cloture rule. It was opposed in a remarkable speech by the late Democratic Senator from Indiana, Mr. Turpie, who, among other things, spoke as follows:

It is very often said, sir, that the majority in this country rules—I have heard it repeated once or twice in the discussion upon the question of cloture—and, therefore, that the majority in this body should rule. That statement is much too broad, whether it be applied to the whole country or to the Senate of the United States. It is much better made in this way, and can be only truly made in this way: The will of the majority expressed under the form of law, or in the form of law, or by the form of law, or in accordance with the form of law, governs in this country and governs in this body, as will be seen in the sequel.

The first form of law to which the majority is subject is the Constitution of the United States, and with respect to this body the second form of law is its own rules. The majority in this body controls its action when action is taken. It passes a bill or defeats a bill. But the majority in this body has never decided either when action shall be taken or whether action shall be taken at all. That has always depended upon the unit, the smallest possible minority. It is the smallest conceivable minority of this body which determines the question when action or whether action shall be taken.

I heard this body characterized the other day as a voting body. I disclaim that epithet very distinctly. I have heard it described elsewhere as a debating body. I disclaim that with equal disfavor. This body is best determined by its principal characteristic. The universal law and genius of language have given a name to this body derived from its principal attribute. It is a deliberative body—the greatest deliberative body in the world.

Now, voting is an incident to deliberation, and debate is an incident to deliberation, but when a body is chiefly characterized as deliberative there is much deliberation apart from discussion and debate, and wholly apart from what is called the business of voting.

The essence and the spirit of a body like ours, now over a century old, may be best gathered from its rules of action, the body of law governing it, always very small, now very brief. Of the 21 rules properly affecting parliamentary procedure in this body 11 relate to the subject of deliberation. More than one-half relate exclusively to that subject, and have nothing to do with debate or voting. I suppose that the form of law under which the will of the majority must control embraces at least the rules which govern us. Here is Rule XXII, one which touches us every day. I think it is the most frequently operative of any in the Senate.

Senator Turpie then quoted the rule, giving a list of the motions that can be made when a question is under discussion, of which the previous question is not one.

It will be observed, Mr. President, that in all these discussions on the question of introducing the previous question into the Senate of the United States, the ablest speeches that were made against the proposition and the most earnest and convincing speeches that were made against it were made by members of the Democratic Party. I know it has been said, and I admit it freely, that when I first came into the Senate I was impressed with the idea that we might well adopt the previous question in this body, as the House of Representatives has adopted it; but it did not take me very long to learn, from listening to the debate of other Senators older in the service than myself, and from examining the proceedings of the Senate covering more than half a century, that my position on that question was not a sound one; and I then came to the conclusion, which I entertain to-day, that the business of the Senate will be better conducted, and that we will have better legislation, if we continue under the rules which exist at the present time.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me for a question?

Mr. GALLINGER. With pleasure.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Shortly after I came to the Senate I was riding to the Capitol one day with Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts. The question of adopting a cloture rule in the Senate came up in connection with a protracted debate which was then ensuing here, and he said to me, "There was a time in my legislative career when I believed that the absence of a cloture rule in the Senate was criminal neglect, and that we should adopt a system of rules by which business could be conducted; but the logic of my long service and observation has now convinced me that I was wrong in that contention. There is a virtue in unlimited debate, the philosophy of which can not be detected upon a surface consideration." He said, "I have looked along down the history of legislation in this country and the history of filibustering in connection with it, and I have yet to find a single measure that the American people desired to see enacted which was not enacted, and I have never seen one defeated that upon full consideration, and when taken in connection with the unfolding events of history, has not been condemned"; and he announced a complete reversal of the position he took during the discussion of what was known as the force bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I want it understood——

Mr. REED. I claim the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri has the floor.

Mr. REED. The Senator from New Hampshire had yielded the floor to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. GALLINGER. No, Mr. President; I did not yield. I yielded for a question, as we all know.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire had fair warning from the Chair that interruptions other than questions would not be tolerated. The Senator from Arkansas did not ask the Senator from New Hampshire any question. The Senator from Missouri has the floor.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Missouri that it would be courteous to the Senator from New Hampshire if he did not claim the floor at this time; but the Chair will certainly recognize the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I shall insist upon my right to the floor. The time for courtesy in this Chamber has passed when we have had a filibuster for eight or nine weeks.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I do not yield.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Will the Senator yield for a word of personal explanation?

Mr. REED. No; because it would cause me to yield the floor. That is the only reason.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Oh, it would not, of course.

Mr. REED. Under the rule that now obtains, it would.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I understood——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. REED. No; I do not yield. I can not yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri does not yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, do I understand that I am taken from the floor? The record will show that I yielded for a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is. That is the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. REED. I am holding the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the ruling of the Chair?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I think it is most extraordinary, but I will have another opportunity to complete what I had intended to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair regrets the circumstance, but——

Mr. GALLINGER. The Chair must know that I yielded merely for a question. I stated it in that form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the chair, when he took it, said that yielding would be a peril to a Senator if he allowed the Senator interrupting to proceed to make a speech. It is perfectly obvious that the Senator from Arkansas did not address an inquiry to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. REED. Now, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I have done this more to enforce a situation than otherwise. For this time I shall yield the floor, and the Presiding Officer of the Senate can recognize the Senator from New Hampshire if he desires; but hereafter I shall insist upon that rule.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, let me at this time make a word of personal explanation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire has the floor

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, as I understand, the Senator from Arkansas rises to a question of personal privilege. If so, I must yield.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator rises to a question of personal privilege——

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I was induced to address the statement I did to the Senator from New Hampshire on the basis of a statement made by the Vice President——

Mr. GALLINGER. It is understood that the Senator from Arkansas rises to a question of personal privilege?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator rises to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a Senator can not rise to a question of personal privilege while another Senator has the floor. It is as much a violation of the rule as the one we have just had.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then, Mr. President, I will proceed. I was not much annoyed by what the Senator from Missouri did. We have become accustomed to listen to lectures from the Senator from Missouri, and to some very disagreeable observations relating to other Senators. I was aware of the fact that I had two opportunities to discuss this question to-day, and I thought that if I was denied the courtesy of continuing under the circumstances, I would have either later in the day or to-morrow an opportunity to continue the discussion. Now I will proceed.

Mr. President, I have sketched, as far as time allowed me to investigate the matter, the several attempts that have been made to enforce so-called cloture by means of the previous question in this body, all of which attempts have proved failures. It now remains for the Senate to determine whether it is prepared at the present time to overthrow the traditions and rules of the Senate and establish a cloture rule. Speaking for myself, I trust that the passions of the hour will not lead the Senate to commit an act that in the future will be a matter of profound regret to its membership. It should be remembered that there are other days and years to follow the present; and I venture to express the belief that if the proposition so earnestly advocated is agreed to it will come back to plague its inventors.

During the nearly quarter of a century that I have been in this body I can recall but one instance where dilatory tactics prevented the passage of a bill that was sustained by the majority judgment of the American people, and I apprehend that if this question passes without a change of our rules it will be a long time again before a bill supported by the majority sentiment of the country will meet defeat at the hands of this body. Let us be patient, in the hope and belief that even if this bill shall be defeated the Government at Washington will still live and no harm will come to any class of our people.

Now, Mr. President, I turn more directly to the discussion of the question at issue, which is whether or not we shall approve the bill which has been before the Senate for so long a time, and which, in the nature of a substitute, has come from the House of Representatives to-day. I know that there are a great many people in the country who believe in the passage of that bill, but I furthermore am satisfied that there is a tremendous majority of the people of the United States who are opposed to its passage, and who, if they had an opportunity, would resist it as earnestly as I have done heretofore and as I now intend to do.

As I said on a former occasion, I am absolutely opposed to the principle of Government ownership in the conduct of any business that can be carried on by private persons or private corporations. I oppose the bill for that reason. I oppose it, furthermore, Mr. President, for the reason that I believe if it is attempted it will of necessity prove a failure and become a tax upon the American people for the losses that will necessarily result.

I noticed this morning in one of the newspapers of Washington an utterance of a former Member of this body which attracted my attention. It was from former Senator Obadiah Gardner, of Maine, who now holds a high position under the present administration. He said:

"If the executive branch of the Government is going to take charge of and supervise every bill that comes up in Congress, then we might as well abolish Congress," said former Senator Obadiah Gardner, of Maine, a member of the International Boundary Commission, at the Willard. Senator Gardner was one of the most loyal supporters of Gov. Wilson for the Democratic nomination and among his most active lieutenants.

Ex-Senator Gardner continued:

The people of my part of the country are opposed to the ship-purchase bill. Years ago I was closely identified with the shipbuilding industry at Thomaston, Me., and at that time the shipbuilders, who employed some 1,500 men, insisted that if we were to build up a great American merchant marine the Government must give them free raw materials. This did not happen, and the shipbuilding industry of Maine was abandoned and the shipyards to-day are grown over with grass. This bill, as I view it, is socialistic in its tendencies; it is a step toward Government ownership, to which I am and always have been opposed.

I was in the Senate when the Panama Canal bill containing the provision for exempting our coastwise vessels from tolls was enacted, and during the argument on the bill I listened with open mind to the speeches of those for and against the exemption clause. I was convinced then that if we exempted our own coastwise vessels from tolls it could in no manner be construed as in conflict with existing treaties, and I voted for the exemption. I have heard no sound argument since then to convince me that I was wrong in my vote, and had I been a Member of the Senate when the repeals bill was up I certainly should have voted against it.

No one has ever questioned my loyalty to the President or the Democratic Party, but men should have the right to differ honestly on great questions without being charged with disloyalty to their party.

The words of Mr. Gardner may well be pondered by his political associates.

The New York Journal of Commerce, one of the ablest papers in the country devoted to financial and trade matters, in its issue of February 11, 1915, only a few days ago in an article the caption of which is, "A colossal blunder," refers to the bill now under consideration as follows:

[From the New York Journal of Commerce, February 11, 1915.]

A COLOSSAL BLUNDER.

There can be no question in the minds of intelligent voters that President Wilson is entirely responsible for the disgraceful struggle that is going on in the United States Senate for "jamming through" the ship-purchase bill to the peril of all other legislation, including that providing for the expenses of the Government for the next fiscal year, and at the risk of forcing an extra session of the new Congress. Apart from more legitimate objections affecting the interests of the Nation, this is a colossal blunder from the political point of view. That the business of the country suffers in various ways from the war that is raging in Europe there is no doubt. It is the inevitable result of the conflict that our foreign trade is seriously hindered for lack of adequate shipping and from consequent high charges for transportation on the main routes of commerce on the ocean. It is easy enough to collect evidence of that fact and complaints of shippers and of producers of commodities for export, the prompt carrying of which is prevented. It is natural that many of these should cry out for relief by the Government; but it does not follow that relief should come from that quarter by having an official board buy and operate merchant vessels at public expense. It does not remove any of the objections to that method of seeking relief, which would surely result in far more harm than good.

There is no evidence of a popular demand for this kind of a policy, which would necessarily be blind to consequences if it existed; no sign of any decided public opinion in its favor, while it is almost unanimously opposed by commercial bodies made up of men who have the best means of judging of the effect. The shipping bill originated with the President and certain members of his Cabinet as an emergency measure when it seemed to many that it was the only way of escape from a virtual embargo upon our foreign commerce. Since then the situation has been improving, and consideration has been given to the subject which convinces most people that there are other and better ways of relief, so far as relief is practicable, and it was never to be expected that relief could be rendered all at once or that it would be complete so long as the war lasted. It is useless to keep reiterating the objections to this scheme from the point of view of business and of national policy. No heed is paid to argument or protest. The support is almost wholly partisan and official; and, so far as it is partisan, it is due to official influence and the driving leadership of the President over the Democratic forces in Congress. It is well known that some representatives of his party in that body who feel bound to vote for the measure to avoid what they fear would be a disastrous split are opposed to it by conviction and there is reason to believe that a majority of them will vote for it reluctantly.

The President is putting the party fidelity of Democratic Senators and Representatives to a severe test by his insistence upon making this an administration measure and trying to force it through by Executive coercion, however much he may believe in its wisdom himself. Apart from the violence done to the convictions and the conscience of those who may submit to the ruthless pressure and sacrifice their independence of opinion and of action, it is an indefensible invasion of the functions of the legislative branch of the Government, and those Senators who are resisting it with all their might are justified on that ground alone. The seven Democrats who insist upon the right to think for themselves, to express their honest opinions freely, and to act upon their convictions and their responsibility to the States which they represent, are doing themselves honor, which will stand upon the record to their credit when the conduct of the President is condemned. It is for him to recommend measures to Congress, with any statement of reasons that may seem to him best, and he has the power to veto any that may be passed by the two Houses which he does not approve, and compel a reconsideration and their abandonment unless they then receive the support of two-thirds of the Members of both Houses. Beyond this he has no right to go, and to use the kind of pressure he is now exerting in favor of a measure of his own and try to force it to enactment is an encroachment upon the legislative power as represensible as would be the use of Executive influence to swerve the judicial branch of the Government in its decisions.

When we speak of this as a blunder, we do not mean simply that we believe that it will prove a mistake for the purpose for which it is designed or that it will turn out to be an error in Government policy. We do believe that and greatly regret the course pursued by the President on that account and hope the consequences will be averted by the defeat of the bill. But we also believe as a matter of forcing party action it is a blunder, and if carried out to its consequences will be fatal to the continuance in power of the party which the President is driving rather than leading. We believe that the shipping scheme would either be a fiasco or would entail results which would prove injurious. We believe there would be a strong reaction against the policy embodied in this plan of Government ownership and operation of shipping in time of war. We do not believe the people of the country are prepared to accept the doctrine that the President and his Cabinet have the right under the Constitution to dictate the action of Congress, to devise measures which they desire to have enacted and use all their official power and influence to drive them through. This savors too much of autocracy or oligarchy. It is inconsistent with a republican form of government and the antithesis of democracy.

A statement was submitted to the Chamber of Commerce of New York a few days ago by Mr. Irving T. Bush, a well-known man, concerning this bill, which contains so much of truth in a few sentences that I will quote it. Mr. Bush said:

GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP AND OPERATION OF SHIPS.

The members of the committee would have gone a long way along radical lines if we felt the passage of the Alexander bill and its adoption would really bring about the results desired. Every available steamship in the world to-day capable of carrying freight is in operation. The only vessels which can be brought to our assistance are those interned in neutral ports belonging to belligerent nations. Private capital will be very glad to take them and finance and operate them if they can be placed under neutral flags without the opposition of the warring powers. We do not wish to place the United States Government in the position of being their purchaser and to impose such responsibility upon it. It is apparent that only by buying new ships will any relief be brought to the present emergency, and it will take at least a year, and probably 18 months, before any substantial tonnage can be produced in that way.

It is necessary to determine, first, the number of ships to be built, to prepare the plans and go through the process of advertising for bids, and then constructing them and placing them in service; and if we do this, what can we accomplish with $30,000,000? The cost of a fair-sized freight-carrying vessel to-day, of only moderate speed, built in American yards, would vary from $500,000 to $1,000,000. I am not speaking of vessels capable of being operated on mail and passenger routes, but I am speaking of freight-carrying vessels; but if the Government should go into this business it is probable that some of the money would be spent upon vessels capable of carrying mails. Therefore we could purchase on the expenditure of $30,000,000 somewhere between 30 and 60 ships, and attempt to restore the American merchant marine in this way.

England alone has 4,235 ships engaged in foreign trade. Does it seem worth while for a nation of the standing of ours, worthy of the constructive genius that has given us our currency reform and our banking measures to attempt to reestablish the American merchant marine with a fleet of from 30 to 60 ships? It is not big enough to do any substantial good, but it is just large enough to discourage private capital and private courage from coming to the assistance of the merchant marine of this country.

The only other reason which would apparently justify the Government in going into the steamship business is that it could be shown to be profitable; but the advocates of the measure themselves state that the only reason why the Government may go into the business of building and operating ships is because private capital can not make any money by doing so. If, therefore, we can not bring any substantial measure of relief to the present situation, and if the Government can make no money by going into the business, is it worth while for so little, to do so small a thing, to commit the Government to the policy of reversal of economic standards which would embark it in a very dangerous and uncertain field?

It seems to me, gentlemen, the suggestion is not worthy this great country or worthy the administration at Washington, which has done in the past some big things in a big way.

In a recent issue of the New York Sun I find the following:

President Wilson was compelled yesterday to modify somewhat the severity of the attitude in which he has been insisting on the passage of his abominable, un-American ship-purchase bill. The compelling circumstances are notorious. They are found in the conditions confronting the President in the ranks of his own party in the Senate.

We do not yet know how far the declaration of an intention to buy no ships that would involve controversies with European belligerents will occasion joy in the contiguous section of Mr. Wilson's official and personal family. If we did know this, we should also know how far the Secretary of the Treasury is responsible for the unfortunate project.

The fact of importance is that this particular modification or concession, enforced by an indignant or alarmed public opinion by speeches like ELIHU ROOT'S and finally by the independent action of the seven Democratic Senators, leaves untouched in potency the principal objection to the measure.

The main reason for defeating the administration's bill was not that it promised to involve the country in complications with one or more of the belligerents, but that it directly involved the Government in mercantile trade in competition with private enterprises, which the Government has no business in common sense and no warrant in sound precedent for undertaking with any ships, however acquired.

This reason remains in all its strength, and the ship-purchase bill should be defeated.

In what crucible of folly or calculated interest and by what alchemy of mischief was brought into existence this un-Democratic, un-Republican, un-American, purely socialistic conception of a Government merchant marine?

The Scientific American, which can not be charged with being a partisan publication, but which is devoted largely to scientific matters, in a recent issue discussed the question in these words:

Although the question of the upbuilding of our merchant marine and the scope and character of the governmental assistance which should be given to assist in its resuscitation is full of complexities, there is one fundamental fact in the situation which is clearly understood by the shipping men, by the private citizen, and even by Congress itself.

We refer to the fact that, because of the better food, better accommodations, higher pay, and other advantages conferred upon the American seamen by the navigation laws of the United States, the cost of running an American ocean-going steamship is so much greater than the cost of running a ship under a foreign flag that successful competition in the deep-sea trade is an absolute impossibility.

Time was, moreover, when it cost very much more to build a ship in American yards than it did in foreign yards; but the margin of that difference has been gradually reduced until now it is comparatively negligible in comparison with the vast difference in the cost of the operation of ships.

Everybody knows that we have failed to build up a modern merchant marine, and everybody knows just why we have failed. To-day the Government, with the strong backing of the President, recognizing the failure of private enterprise, wishes to go into the shipping business itself and fly its flag over a fleet of Government-owned ships, hoping thereby to build up an American merchant marine, and promising, when the new venture is fully established, to withdraw in favor of private operation and ownership.

We wish to put ourselves on record as stating, first, that the whole scheme bristles with fallacies; secondly, that the latest trade returns show that a Government-owned fleet is unnecessary; thirdly, that it will work injustice to the private owners of ocean-going ships; and, last and most important of all, that this shipping bill may well prove to be a snare which will sooner or later entangle us in the great European war.

In the first place, the Government is violating one of the fundamental, if unwritten, principles upon which government is based if it enters into a business enterprise in competition with the private interests of its citizens.

Such action would be wrong in any case, and it is particularly vicious when the interests against which the Government will compete are already having the greatest difficulty in keeping their heads above water. It should be the policy of the Government to encourage our struggling merchant marine, not to drive it from the seven seas.

Furthermore, the plea of the President that the war has so disorganized the carrying trade that there are not enough ships to handle our imports and exports has been completely demolished by the recent trade returns, which show an increase of exports for December, 1914, over those of December, 1913, of over $13,000,000.

As we said at the outset, facts are what we should keep our eyes upon, not theories. And if ever cold, hard facts demolished a plausible theory these trade returns for December have swept away the one plausible plea that has been made for this ill-conceived Government-ownership scheme.

Be it remembered, also, that in the very nature of things an enterprise which private capital and the best brains of the country have failed to make profitable can never be run at a profit if handled by the Government.

Our humanitarian navigation laws render it certain that Government-owned fleets will be run at a loss. That loss must be made good from the Treasury, and to this extent the proposed Government-owned fleet will become a tax upon the people—a manifest injustice.

The last and surely the most important objection of all against this fatuous bill is the grave and ever-present danger which it will introduce in the international situation. The right of search on the high seas exists and is recognized; contraband of war is liable to find its way into the bottom of ships, whatever flag they fly; and a situation is conceivable in which the right of search might be exercised on a ship that was sailing under the Government flag.

Is the presidential hand which wrote the so-called "declaration of neutrality" prepared to sign a measure which might easily upset in a single day the neutral attitude which the President's proclamation has thus far so successfully assured?

I called attention a few days ago, Mr. President, to a great meeting that was held in Faneuil Hall, in Boston, addressed by both Republicans and Democrats, and presided over by a Democrat, the mayor of Boston, a gentleman who recently by resignation left the House of Representatives, and that at that great meeting a resolution was unanimously passed denouncing the present ship-purchase bill. I will read the resolution:

Resolved, That a meeting of citizens of Massachusetts, assembled in Faneuil Hall this 4th day of February, A. D. 1915, does hereby record its emphatic protest against the passage by the Congress of the United States of the so-called ship-purchase bill.

When I first called attention to this great meeting, Mr. President, my amiable friend the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] declared that Mayor Curley, who presided, did not give the opponents of the resolution an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. President, the fact is that one gentleman who was not on the list of speakers, a man whom I know to be a meddler and a busybody always, demanded a right to be heard, and he was hissed by the great audience. Yet he sends a telegram here saying that Mayor Curley exercised despotic power and did not give the opposition an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. GALLINGER. I am reminded of what occurred a little while ago. I yield for a question, and that alone.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire yields for a question.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I should like to ask the Senator a question, whether he does not know that the so-called busybodies stir up the dear interests of the people occasionally and endeavor to demand the people's rights? This was the case in the instance the Senator cited——

Mr. GALLINGER. The question has been asked, Mr. President. Possibly the Senator was not here a little while ago when I was taken off the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire declines to yield further. The Senator from New Hampshire will proceed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will get through sooner to-day, Mr. President, if speeches are not injected into the belly of my remarks by other Senators.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I do not want, Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I propose now only to yield for a question. I am not discussing the question of busybodies to-day, although that might be made a prolific subject of discussion.

Mr. President, the Marine Journal, of New York, a paper devoted to the marine interests of the country, and which has a very wide circulation, under date of January 30, 1915, discusses this question under the caption "Government ownership a subsidy in fact"—a matter that I have over and over again suggested in this debate, but it has been resisted by Senators holding a different opinion from that which I hold. The Marine Journal says:

It is only pride of opinion or prejudice that prevents the administration leaders in Washington from making their Government-ownership bill over into an outright subsidy bill. They have denounced subsidy so much and fought the Republicans so stubbornly that they hate to make a frank surrender and acknowledge that that is the only way out of the present emergency. Yet the purchase, ownership, and operation of foreign-built or home-built vessels in over-seas commerce at national expense is practically a subsidy policy and nothing else. The increased cost of running the vessels under the American flag, due to the higher wages, higher standards of living, and in part to the requirements of the navigation laws, and the additional handicap of foreign subsidies to some foreign lines, are exactly what Republican subsidy legislation sought to cover and to compensate for. The Government-ownership bill would compensate for this also, but in another way, without providing a specific payment for a given service or a given line. Under the Democratic plan the ships would be owned temporarily by the Government, it is true, but only temporarily, the purpose being, as the President himself has said, to turn these ships over to private hands as soon as the lines are profitable. Meanwhile 49 per cent of the stock of the Government shipping corporation operating these craft can be held by private investors.

The Republican plan was to offer a certain subvention for a regular steamship service to a given foreign port, the contract to be awarded to the lowest responsible bidder. This would result in the payment by the Government of no more than the additional cost of maintaining an American as against a foreign steamship service; that is, with competition in bidding, the work would be undertaken at the lowest possible cost. But the Democratic plan is to have the Government buy the ships and start the line. It will inevitably cost the Government at least as much more money to operate an American line as it would cost experienced private shipowners. In fact, it would unquestionably cost the Government a great deal more, because it would not have the knowledge of the business or the spur to economy that comes of the requirement of earning dividends. Then, at the year's end, whatever deficit occurs as the result of the operation of an American steamship line is to be made up out of the Public Treasury.

Government ownership—the Democratic way—is subsidy and nothing else in the last and true analysis. It is a clumsy, extravagant form of subsidy. The Republican plan is an infinitely better plan, more economical, more efficient, in thorough accord with the practice of the maritime world. If the Democratic leaders are wise and broad and statesmanlike, they will adopt it. This is no time for narrow partisanship; the people can not be fooled.

I find so much good material, Mr. President, in the New York Sun recently that I will discriminate in the articles I shall quote from that great paper, a paper of mighty influence in the country, a paper that I think has always treated the present administration fairly, but I will take the liberty of reading a very brief editorial published not long ago under the caption "For whose benefit?"

The resolutions adopted yesterday by the Merchants Association concerning the ship-purchase bill present squarely and state clearly the three great dangers inherent in that measure:

1. The danger of such legislation as a precedent in paternalism.

2. The danger to the future of an American mercantile marine which must in any case depend ultimately on private enterprise and management, and could not operate successfully either as the partner or as the competitor of the Government.

3. The danger of grave complications with the belligerent powers, leading probably if not certainly to a clash with one or all of them.

It is to the last of these three perils that public attention is now most generally directed. The extent of the consequences involved is becoming apparent to the people as the administration persists in demanding the passage of its ship-purchase bill.

There is something else not quite so apparent.

Why is the administration willing "to purchase a quarrel," as Senator ROOT puts it, "with every ship"?

What is behind this sinister proposal? For whose benefit or profit is the Nation asked to incur the risk of war?

It is not a question of national honor and national courage, but of national common sense. Is there not war enough in the world to-day?

Mr. President, when I read this morning's newspapers I was profoundly impressed with the feeling that possibly our Nation is to-day nearer war than most of us imagine. For that reason I join with those who have heretofore protested, and who will later on protest, that we ought not to engage in any policy that could by any possibility involve the United States in the terrible, destructive, and inhuman war that is now engaging the attention of some of the leading nations of the world. We can not afford to do it; we ought not to take any risk, however slight it may be, if that danger can otherwise be avoided.

The Boston Herald of recent date, under the caption of "The common sense of the present situation," has an editorial which is so full of common sense that I will read it into my remarks. It is as follows:

The administration and Congress are pushing the shipping bill. Is it a wise measure? A purchase of ships from any one of the belligerent nations, which are then to be put under our flag, is against the laws of nations. As has been said in Washington, it may involve us in a war with any nation, or at least an injurious wrangle or a humiliation from being obliged to sell the vessels again.

Why should the Government organize a corporation to buy ships? The rate of freights is high. Very good. The consumer pays the freight, and not the shipper from our side of the water. No farmer complains of the high prices of wheat, corn, oats, meat, horses; no manufacturer complains of the high prices of shoes or clothing, and why should we complain of the high price of freight on ships? If it comes to an American shipowner, it is good for the Nation; if it goes to a foreign shipowner, we have nothing to say—it is the consumer who pays the freight.

Mr. President, I was struck this afternoon by the answer the distinguished Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] gave to the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], who interrupted him to inquire if he did not think the ocean rates were altogether too high, and if he did not think this Government-ownership scheme might possibly reduce them, when the Senator from Nebraska said, and said truly, that, while the freight rates are high, it is the foreigner who pays the freight; that it does not concern our own people. As the Boston Herald points out, if the advanced rates go to the owners of American ships, then we are that much to the good. This article continues:

The number of ships for the Pacific trade is too large, and some of them are available. A part of our coastwise shipping is available, and on the Great Lakes are many available vessels which will come out in a month or two, and indeed could be got out to-day by cutting the ice on the Welland Canal. Some of that lake shipping which is now lying idle would be available for coastwise trade, and some for transoceanic trade. With a little patience the demand for ships will bring them to our shores, for it will not happen in this busy world that conveyances, whether cars or ships, will long be wanted in vain.

A company organized by the Government will pay a high price for ships to-day, and when the war is over the same shipping will be in the market at half price, for England is building ships faster than ever. Has the Government noticed that the price paid for building ships has risen very much, and that that price governs the cost of shipping to-day?

My attention was attracted a little time ago, Mr. President, by the observation of an Englishman, that if this Government discovered English ships that could be purchased, they would be secondhand ships which would be sold to the Government of the United States at high prices. He said "We are building new ships now as rapidly as our shipyards will turn them out. When the war is over, we shall put our new ships on the ocean routes of commerce and drive out of business the secondhand ships that we are going to sell to our neighbor across the ocean." It seems to me that that was a sensible observation. This editorial continues, repeating the observation of my English friend:

To sum up: The high rates paid by European consumers to our shipowners puts money into the pockets of our people—and these high rates are paid on the other side of the water. The bill is not sound, as tending to a dispute with European nations and to a complete unsettling of confidence. It is not sound economically

We have had enough disturbances, which unsettle our people, who are clamoring for work and food. If we had a war or a threatened war, it would discourage many enterprises which are beginning to hold up their heads and which would give the workmen a living. Why run the risk of that? If our country could have a rest, know that nothing new was impending, and be able to reckon on fair times, we could move on. At present people are waiting and guessing. They do not know how to do the sum, and the Government can help them or not as it chooses. Men ought not to have to guess, for that breeds speculation—the very thing which our Government deprecates.

It is beyond the understanding of business men how the President and Secretary Bryan, who are the strong friends of peace and are constantly urging neutrality, can push any disturbing measure like this shipping bill. It is the duty of every citizen, whether Democrat or Republican, to object, and to resist it to the utmost. Let us have peace and a rest, and then the sun will come out.

I wish to say, Mr. President, that that article was written by Col. Henry L. Higginson, who is well known throughout the country, a man of high learning and culture, and a man who thinks very profoundly on public questions. He calls attention to the fact that our industrial situation is not so good as it might be. I want to emphasize that fact by saying that investigations that I have attempted to make lead me to the conclusion that, aside from the increased business that has come to certain classes of manufacturers in this country in consequence of orders from abroad consequent upon the war, we are 40 per cent below the normal, so far as general business is concerned.

A few days ago the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] called attention to the fact that the Locomotive Firemen and Engineers' organization had indorsed the shipping bill. That is true. They have a right to their own opinion, of course; but in that very memorial, or petition, or statement, or whatever we may call it, that great organization started out with the assertion that there were at least 3,000,000 people out of employment at the present time in the United States. I might take up that question, Mr. President, but I shall not do so at the present time. Later on, between now and the 4th day of March, I will take occasion, if the business of the Senate and my own personal convenience will enable me to do so, to discuss the industrial situation as it is upon us at the present time and as it doubtless will be upon us at a later time, due, as I believe, to the economic fallacies in the present tariff law that is upon our statute books.

The Pacific Marine Review, which is published on the Pacific coast, has a long article on this subject, but I am only going to quote one paragraph. It says:

The economic conditions which obtain in the United States have strangled the American shipping industry. No attempt is to be made to remove those conditions, but a new shipping industry is to be created. We are loath to say anything rude, but really this seems more like a madman's dream than the considered plan of a statesman. If American shipping could not be made to pay yesterday it can not be made to pay to-morrow, unless the conditions which militated against it are done away with. It may be made to show a profit on paper, but the loss will be there all the same. No man ever got rich by taking money out of one of his pockets and putting it into another. But, after all, it is not patriotic of us to criticize the movement in this disagreeable fashion. The passing of the bill would mean that the United States would come into the market as a heavy purchaser of secondhand tonnage at fancy prices. This would mean money in the pocket of the British shipowner, who would then proceed to spend some of it on new tonnage to compete with the old material which he had disposed of. Presently, when America had made another unearthly mess of the business, she would be wanting to get rid of her purchases again for next to nothing, and there would be some cheap bargains to be had. Therefore we ought rather to back up President Wilson right heartily, regarding him as a benefactor in disguise.

A very brief editorial from the Philadelphia Inquirer headed "Private shippers to be crushed" reads:

Speaking at New Orleans before the Association of Commerce, which had entered a formal protest against the passage of the Fletcher ship-purchase bill, Secretary Redfield announced that "if private shipping interests of the United States continue to act unjustly toward the shipper—and they have that power now—we will crush them."

That statement is quite in line with the spirit and the procedures of the present administration. It will be remembered that, even before he had been inaugurated, Mr. Wilson announced that anyone who tried to start a panic while he was President would be hanged higher than Haman, and scarcely had Mr. Redfield taken office as Secretary of Commerce than he issued a proclamation whereby manufacturers were warned that if they reduced the wages of their employees or restricted their operations their doing so would be regarded as an attempt to discredit the policies of the Democratic Party, and their books would be examined by Government experts with the idea of showing them up. It is true that this threat was not executed, but that it should have been uttered sufficiently indicates the temper by which the present administration is animated and controlled.

Now it is the private shipping interest of the United States which are to be disciplined by being crushed through the power to be conferred upon the Government by the enactment of the very dangerous and radically unsound measure which President Wilson is forcing upon a reluctant Senate and a disgusted country. And yet Mr. Wilson continues to insist that the prevailing depression is merely psychological, that there is not nearly so much unemployment as has been reported, and that "we are on the verge of a new era of enterprise and of prosperity." That is what he told the American Electric Railway Association the other day, and he actually had the assurance to claim that he and his party had emancipated the business world and had led it out of the wilderness in which for 20 years it had been wandering.

The Chicago Tribune—and, even at the risk of advertising that great newspaper, which does not need advertising, I will venture to say that it is one of the most potential and influential and widely circulated newspapers in all the world—a few days ago had an editorial under the caption "More shipping encouragement," which is brief, and which reads as follows:

Fearful and wonderful indeed are the notions of the would-be ship purchasers behind the administration bill regarding the ways and means of aiding and promoting a merchant marine.

Their first happy thought was to provide Government competition for the private ships. The Government, as we know, has a perfect contempt of cost. It scorns and defies modern accounting and bookkeeping. The power to tax is the power to pay deficits and make them appear like neat surpluses. How private capital would rejoice and glory in such competition!

Now, the friends of the bill have bettered their instructions. Further to stimulate and encourage the private merchant marine, further to tempt fresh capital into deep water, they are proposing amendments which give the shipping board to be created by them, if the bill passes, practically unlimited power to impose rules and regulations on all shipping and water-borne commerce of the United States. These rules may be changed at will and revised upward or downward at any moment.

Thus the Government is not only to compete on its own terms with private enterprise, but to regulate and control its competitors and to see to it that they do not establish a monopoly or make undue charges or excessive profits.

How capital will rush into the ocean carrying business under such delectable prospects, under such "certainty" as to the future! Business, as every sane man knows, needs certainty above all things. The ship bill as improved by partisan caucus and partisan thinking gives the merchant marine the one certainty that everything will be perpetually uncertain. We can see with the mind's eye a splendid merchant marine growing up by leaps and bounds under the stimuli of the bill; but, alas, that merchant marine will not be American. What queer business and what queer statesmanship the "perfected" bill embodies!

I have here, Mr. President, an editorial from the New York Times, another great newspaper which has not been hostile to the policies of the present administration, but, on the other hand, as a rule, has been extremely friendly. The editorial is headed "The administration's appeal to business judgment," and is as follows:

In his remarks before the American Electric Railway Association the President said: "Therefore, we have got to trade not only on our efficiency, not only on the service that we render, but on the confidence that we cultivate." What confidence is the administration cultivating among the men of business to whom his remarks were addressed, although not within sound of his voice? The Treasury now has a deficit of $88,000,000, and the Secretary of the Treasury tells the country that it is a matter of no present consequence; old or new taxes will take care of the debt on current account. The reliance is especially upon the income tax, a tax which particularly reflects such depression as is admitted by the Post Office Department. No precise statement of the Post Office's deficit is procurable, but it is said to be "millions." To that should be added the millions which ought to be paid for services which the Post Office requisitions from the railroads on a contract which the Congress makes without negotiations with those who do the work. If the Post Office and Treasury are in this condition, what confidence can the country feel in the President's assurance that times are not so bad as business men think? The Post Office's official statement specifically says that its troubles are due to the troubles of business.

With sentiment in this dubious state the President presses his shipping bill upon the country contrary to authoritative expressions of the large business interests of the country, and it is supported in Congress by arguments affronting to commercial intelligence. In an official report favoring the project two Secretaries present an exhibit that "almost the whole sum, $532,110,000, would be paid to foreign steamship owners, and would have an important bearing upon our foreign trade balances; it might, in fact, turn those balances against us." The extent to which the Government shipping line would lessen that calamity can be figured, but it is not worth while to take the trouble. Even before this official misrepresentation was made it was pointed out that the farmers sell their wheat on their farms, oftentimes, and usually on some neighboring exchange. The chief grain markets are near the center of the continent, where freight is not calculated, still less paid. The decorous Journal of Commerce loses its temper over the incident and says that the joint report of the two Secretaries is "too idiotic for serious comment."

That is opinion only. The repeated statements that other than belligerents' vessels are available are not in accordance with the facts on any scale worth the Government's action. As a matter of international law French and British ships are just as undesirable purchases as German or Austrian. German cruisers like the Karlsruhe would capture French or British ships masquerading under the American flag as quickly as the British warships would if they had the opportunity. But England has declared that the sale of British ships in war time is forbidden, and France has none to spare. No doubt there are vessels in the world to be bought by the Government, but it could get them only by overbidding private buyers, and could use them only by underbidding in the freight market. If the Government could provide cheap freights in that manner, it would be a costly bargain, whether or not it was within the Government's "rights." A right is something which can be waived at discretion, not something which must be exercised contrary to common sense.

That these things are so in the opinion of business men appears from the formal condemnation of the proposal by such reputable bodies as the Merchants' Association and the chamber of commerce of this city. They disapprove on argument and theory. The Boston Maritime Agency dissents on the statement of fact, explicitly contradicting the assertions in support of the bill. Those who support it are more few than fit, and their chief reliance is that the bill ought to be passed because the "interests" oppose it. It may be that there are interests supporting it, but the argument from unproved motives is both unworthy and unnecessary. Secretary Bryan said yesterday in a formal statement that it was to be assumed "that the authority conferred upon the President and those who will be associated with him in the matter will be exercised properly and with a due regard to the Nation's welfare." How can such a thing be assumed of gentlemen capable of putting forward such a measure? If it be conceded that their intentions are all that they ought to be, and doubtless are, how can it be thought right to intrust them with a discretion wider than the Czar's, all laws on the subject being repealed specifically for that express purpose? Congress washed its hands of the railway-rate question by turning it over to a commission, and after nearly 30 years it is seen that it is necessary to control the commission. Can it be wished that the ocean freights shall be thrown into similar confusion, without the slightest suggestion of the standards and principles by which the Government board should be guided? The President may as well take friendly warning that it makes no difference what the political effect of the bill may be, nor whether it is defeated or passed. He puts in jeopardy the confidence of the very class to which he is appealing. Prosperity is impossible without the confidence of business men, and confidence is seriously shaken both by the bill itself and the stubbornness with which it is pressed without nonpolitical support worthy the name.

The New York Evening Post, which has been a thick-and-thin supporter of the administration until the advent of the shipping bill, is now outspoken in opposition. Under the caption, "A Reputation in Peril," this great newspaper recently said:

If the shipping bill itself was a mistake some of the methods chosen by the President to urge it on the way to enactment have been still greater mistakes. To make of this measure, hatched in secrecy and never alluded to in a party platform, a test of party allegiance is most unwise. To affirm that those who are opposing it are "defying the Nation" is rash in the extreme. By such a course the President is both imperiling his reputation for sound judgment and needlessly hazarding his deservedly great prestige.

Mr. President, I have a great many other extracts from journals of the highest standing in the country in opposition to this bill, but I will not present them. I now want to turn my attention to certain matters that have been under discussion by Senators on both sides of the Chamber which I think are deserving of consideration before the vote is taken upon the bill.

In a speech the other day, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] spoke of "the Shipping Trust" as "very busy in and about the opposition to this bill." Indeed, the Senator from Missouri has several times called our attention to the fact that that old friend, the Shipping Trust, was in Washington opposing the passage of this measure.

The Senator's denunciation of the Shipping Trust as opposing this bill is delicious. What is the Hamburg-American Line, the head and front of the trust, but a foreign concern and the ostensible beneficiary of the proposed legislation? The Senator from Missouri was indulging in real, though perhaps unconscious, humor when he made the remark about the Shipping Trust and omitted to tell us that it is a foreign trust.

Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] desires to give a notice, and with the understanding that it will not take me off the floor——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Mexico can give notice without taking the Senator off the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then I yield for that purpose.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I desire now to give notice that to-morrow morning, immediately after the routine morning business, in the event of an adjournment, or upon the convening of the Senate if there is a recess, I shall address the Senate upon the shipping bill and the pending business before the Senate, which, I believe, is the caucus rule amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, there has been some talk in this present debate about a "coastwise steamship trust," which, of course, if it existed, would be American. The Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], who has charge of this bill, declared in his speech of January 28 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 2459) that—

Investigation of the coastwise shipping interests develops a situation equally interesting. Nine-tenths of the Atlantic-coast shipping is owned by the railroads and two corporations. The report of the House Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries says:

"The steamers of the railroad-controlled lines, combined with those of the Eastern Steamship Corporation and the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Steamship Lines, number 199, or 84.7 per cent of the above-mentioned total for the 28 lines, and represent 516,055 gross tons, or 93.9 per cent of the total gross tonnage. Not only do the railroads and the two shipping consolidations dominate over nine-tenths of the tonnage, but it is significant that very few of the principal routes on our entire Atlantic and Gulf coasts are served by more than one regular steamship line."

Inadvertently the Senator from Florida, quoting from the House committee report, fell into an error which has entrapped other Senators, an error to which I called attention during a debate some months ago. This report of the House committee, as the context clearly shows, and as the able chairman of the committee, Judge ALEXANDER, of Missouri, has frankly emphasized—this report of the committee was dealing only with the "regular line services," which control altogether only a small fraction of the tonnage of our great coastwise marine.

On page 406 of the Alexander report it is stated that on the Atlantic coast, the Gulf coast, the Pacific coast, and the Great Lakes together, "all told the 30 lines referred to in the preceding chapters as controlled by railroads or shipping consolidations operate 330 steamers of 868,741 gross tons, or nearly 70 per cent of the total number of steamers, and 74 per cent of the tonnage." But the report again and again makes it plain that what is referred to here is not 74 per cent of the total tonnage of our coastwise marine, but 74 per cent of the tonnage of that relatively small part of the coastwise marine engaged in "regular line services."

According to the report of the Commissioner of Navigation the total tonnage of the American merchant marine in coastwise commerce on June 30, 1914, was 6,852,536, including 24,538 vessels, of which 14,607 were steamers. But the total number of steamers controlled by railroads or shipping consolidations in regular line services, as the Alexander report states above, is 330 of 868,741 gross tons. So that, Mr. President, while in the coastwise trade we have 24,538 vessels, of which 14,607 are steamers, the vessels engaged in the regular line service, where they very likely have some kind of an agreement, number only 330; and, while there is a tonnage in the coastwise service of 6,852,536 tons, the tonnage of the vessels engaged in regular line service is only 868,741 tons. In other words, instead of being 90 per cent, as some Senators have stated, or 74 per cent, as others have stated, the American coastwise steamships controlled by railroads or shipping consolidations represent a tonnage of only 868,741 out of a total tonnage in the American coastwise marine of 6,852,536. Instead of 90 per cent or 74 per cent this railroad-controlled or consolidation-controlled tonnage is only about 13 per cent of American coastwise shipping.

Let us hope that it will not again be necessary to make this particular correction in this Chamber, and that the official facts and figures quoted will lay forever the ghost of a "coastwise shipping trust" under American colors. The more than 24,000 vessels in the American coastwise fleet, including the river and lake fleet, represent unquestionably several hundred thousand separate owners and stockholders and several thousand separate managements. A trust in the great American coastwise shipping trade is no more real or possible than a trust of the corn farmers or apple growers of Missouri. One is just as reasonable and actual as the other.

But that a real, active, and powerful Shipping Trust exists in the over-seas trade of the United States will not be denied—it can not be disputed.

I might add that by a recent decision of a Federal court of the State of New York it was found that no trust actually existed at the present time, because the war had worked its dissolution; but that a foreign Shipping Trust has long existed, and has been not only powerful but absolutely dominating, so far as the over-seas trade is concerned, is something that will not be disputed by anybody who has looked into the subject. And let us remember that more than nine-tenths of the over-seas commerce of the United States is monopolized by foreign ships, foreign officered, foreign manned, flying the flags of Europe or Japan. That same report of the Merchant Marine Committee, presented by Judge ALEXANDER, states, page 415, that—

The facts contained in the foregoing report show that it is the almost universal practice for steamship lines engaging in the American foreign trade to operate, both on the inbound and outbound voyages, under the terms of written agreements, conference arrangements, or gentlemen's understandings, which have for their principal purpose the regulation of competition through either (1) the fixing or regulation of rates; (2) the apportionment of traffic by allotting the ports of sailing, restricting the number of sailings, or limiting the volume of freight which certain lines may carry; (3) the pooling of earnings from all or a portion of the traffic; or (4) meeting the competition of nonconference lines. Eighty such agreements or understandings, involving practically all the regular steamship lines operating on nearly every American foreign trade route, are described in the foregoing report.

At the head of this combination, practically all or almost all foreign, for at the outbreak of the war there were only six American steamers out of the hundreds of steamers engaged in our trans-Atlantic trade, stand two great German concerns, the Hamburg-American Co. and the North German Lloyd Co. Of these the Hamburg-American has been regarded as the largest and most powerful steamship organization in the world. If it is a crime, as some Senators maintain, for a steamship company to be a party to conferences, pooling agreements, gentlemen's agreements, and so forth, then it is the Hamburg-American Co., of Hamburg, Germany, which is the principal offender. A list of the agreements and conferences with which the Hamburg-American is or was affiliated requires almost an entire page of the subject index of the Alexander report, page 440. I have heard it said that the Emperor of Germany was one of the principal stockholders of the Hamburg-American Co., and that this concern enjoyed to an extraordinary degree the favor and support of the Imperial Government. But be that as it may, the Hamburg-American is undeniably the head and front of the world-girdling chain of steamship conferences, agreements, and combinations, or was before the great war which is raging in Europe. In our own waters, as the Alexander report shows in detail, it is a principal factor in the European combination, in the Baltic pool agreement, the South American combination, in the trade to India and the East Indian Archipelagoes. That other great German steamship company, the North German Lloyd, is second only to the Hamburg-American in the number and scope of steamship combinations.

It is asserted by the Senator from Missouri that the Shipping Trust "has been very busy in and about the opposition to this bill." I would like to ask the Senator if he has heard of any definite opposition to this measure from the Hamburg-American Co., of Hamburg, Germany, or the North German Lloyd Co., of Bremen? These two concerns, as the Alexander report shows, are the central factors in the steamship combinations of the world. Can the Senator from Missouri quote a single sentence or a line which the managers of these great German shipping combinations have written or said against the measure under discussion in the Senate?

I venture the opinion that he can not quote a single word. But there have been measures in years past under discussion in this Senate when the opposition of the great German steamship companies was very active and powerful indeed. I refer to the great shipping bill introduced some years ago by the late Senator Frye, of Maine. Hardly had this bill been offered in the Senate than Herr Ballin, of Hamburg, who was then and is now the head of the Hamburg-American Steamship Co., came hastily to this country and gave out a long and bitter statement in the American newspapers attacking Senator Frye and the proposed legislation, and forcibly objecting to any and every expedient, either by mail subsidy, by preferential duty, or any other method, to encourage and strengthen American shipping in the over-seas trade, a monopoly of over 90 per cent of which was held then and is held now by Herr Ballin and other foreign steamship managers.

Again and again other officials of these German steamship combinations attacked the Republican efforts made by Senator Frye and by other Senators to restore the ocean shipping of the United States. Their statements and arguments were frequently utilized by the opponents of this legislation in this and the other House of Congress. Everybody knew where the German steamship combinations stood with regard to the ocean mail bill which I had the honor of introducing and advocating. They did not want that legislation; they argued against it; they used their utmost influence to prevent its enactment. And I have no doubt that when, by a very narrow majority, the desired legislation failed, rejoicing was loud and unconcealed in Bremen and Hamburg. These foreign steamship combinations dreaded above everything else the reappearance of the American flag on the high seas. They feared that the bill of Senator Frye and the bill which I myself offered here would eventually have on American shipbuilding and navigation the same effect which the protective tariff has had on American manufacturing, and that we would soon become, under a fair policy of national encouragement, the foremost shipping Nation, as we long since became the foremost manufacturing Nation, in the world. They were frank in their opposition. I can not blame them. I do not speak in censure of them. They were naturally devoted first to German interests, as we are or should be devoted first to American interests.

But can the Senator from Missouri tell me of a single word or syllable that has been heard from these real European Steamship Trusts and combinations against the proposal now pending? Has the Hamburg-American Co. or the North German Lloyd Co. objected to anybody, anywhere, to this proposal to appropriate $30,000,000 from the Treasury of the United States for the purchase, as many of us have understood—and as the whole country is coming to understand—for the purchase of interned steamships of the Hamburg-American fleet and the North German Lloyd fleet? It has been stated in the newspapers that the loss to these great German shipping combinations on their vessels lying idle in our ports was $500,000 every day. This is one of the terrible costs of the great war, which I regret and all Americans regret.

Is it just to the American people that this loss of $500,000 a day should be taken from the shoulders of the two great German steamship companies by the transfer of these vessels to the Government of the United States? Is the Senator from Missouri prepared to go so far in that direction? I am not.

So far as a Shipping Trust exists, so far as it is a factor in our business or our politics, let us all know and remember that it is a foreign trust—foreign almost wholly in its ownership, foreign in its management. When the war began, ships flying the American flag were conveying only 8 per cent of our ocean commerce. There is no very great material for a domineering trust or combination in that feeble 8 per cent. It is in the 92 per cent foreign that the Senator from Missouri will find wealth and power, backed by the treasuries of foreign Governments. And the most active and aggressive factors in the world's shipping combinations have been historically these two great German steamship companies which I have mentioned—the very concerns which, according to common report and common understanding, would be the direct, actual beneficiaries of the proposed legislation. No greater boon could possibly be bestowed upon these German steamship companies than to take their idle, costly vessels off their hands. To pay $30,000,000 of American money or any substantial part of it to these German steamship companies for their interned steamers, many of which are small and many obsolete or semiobsolete, would be to strengthen the resources of those two concerns in a way more welcome and more effective than could be done by any mere annual subsidies. Such a payment would enable the German steamship combinations, when the war is over, to take this American money and build new, improved, efficient, economical ships, and with these vessels to drive the older German craft, under expensive American Government ownership, off the trade routes of commerce, off the oceans of the world.

Again I will ask the Senator from Missouri if he has heard a word or a syllable of objection to this pending measure from the Hamburg-American Co. or the North German Lloyd Co., which, according to the able and authoritative Alexander report, are the head and front of all ocean steamship combinations?

As before remarked, the Shipping Trust is a foreign concern. It has fought every bill that has been offered in Congress to rehabilitate the American merchant marine.

The American correspondent of the London Times in March, 1902, warned European shipowners and merchants that the Roosevelt administration was heartily in favor of the American shipping bill, but held out to them the hope that "the whole free trade or antiprotection opinion of the country is against it, which includes the Democratic Party, the strong minority of the Senate and House of Representatives, and the very powerful, able, tireless press." Those words I quote accurately, Mr. President.

This British correspondent added:

> The failure of Mr. Frye's previous bill was thought to be due in no small measure to the active and very intelligent opposition of English and foreign steamship companies. Their managers thought their interests jeopardized by that bill. They are understood to hold the same opinion with reference to the present bill, and to be not less vigilant than they were last year in looking after their imperiled interests. The lobby system of Washington is such as to make an opposition of that kind efficient, quite irrespective of nationality. It must be added that the ship-subsidy bill does not stand alone. No measure stands alone. There is none for which votes may not be had or withheld with reference to the obtaining or refusing of votes for other bills whose fate is also uncertain.

At the annual meeting of the Association of Chambers of Commerce of the United Kingdom in London on March 4, 1902, the president of the chamber, Lord Avebury, spoke of American subsidy legislation as a menace to British maritime supremacy, but endeavored to reassure his hearers by the assertion that "he did not anticipate that the nonmaritime States would remain passive and see nine millions in bounty go to the maritime States without protest."

Herr Albert Ballin, director general of the Hamburg-American Co., in the New York Herald, Tuesday, November 17, 1903, said, "I see that already high officials at Washington have begun to presage the passage of a subsidy bill," and he declared his opposition to the proposed legislation.

Emil L. Boas, general manager of the Hamburg-American Line, in the New York Herald of Saturday, January 2, 1904, pages 8 and 9, financial and commercial review, said:

> Whether the American merchant marine shall be aided by liberal payments from the Public Treasury or whether other means shall be adopted to induce Americans to enter more freely into foreign shipping ventures is a question which has again come to the front. The subsidy system has many earnest advocates in this country, who never fail to point in a general way to results obtained in foreign countries through the fostering care of their Governments, it being stated that wherever there has been an extensive development of the merchant marine it was due to the systematic appropriation of large sums from the State treasury for the special object of encouraging shipping. These assertions have been made so frequently by newspapers, on the platform, and in Congress that a great many people consider them a matter of record and do not question them. An examination, however, will show that they have no foundation in fact.

Mr. Boas went on to argue at length against the adoption of any subsidy system by America. At the end of his article he quoted certain statements made by Consul General Frank H. Mason at Berlin, cited by Senator Frye a while before in his reply to Herr Ballin, director general of the Hamburg-American Line. "These statements," Mr. Boas said, "I wish to controvert."

Mr. Boas, in the New York Herald of Monday, January 2, 1905, financial and commercial review, further declared:

> The question of stimulating the American merchant marine and adopting means to induce Americans more freely to venture upon ocean shipping ventures has again come to the front. A commission appointed by Congress has carefully inquired into this question, having had many meetings in different parts of the country, and obtained the testimony of a large number of people interested in the subject. The report of the committee will be presented to Congress early in January. It has been confidently stated that the committee will recommend a more extended system of subsidies, the imposition of discriminating duties, and (or) the levy of higher tonnage taxes on all vessels with rebates to American ships.

Then Mr. Boas proceeded to attack in detail not only subsidies but discriminating duties and tonnage taxes, and commended to Congress the editorial advice of a New York commercial newspaper—the Journal of Commerce, of November 28, 1904—in which the Hamburg-American and other foreign concerns were conspicuous and constant advertisers.

This editorial attacked Rear Admiral Stephen B. Luce, who had contended before the Merchant Marine Commission that the huge sums paid by the American people to foreign shipowners for carrying their imports and exports went to enrich countries with which the United States might some day be at war, thereby fostering the navies of those countries and the navies of the world at the expense of the United States.

The editorial closed with an exhortation to let foreigners have the profit of shipping and devote ourselves to something else.

These foreign gentlemen were very generous to the people of the United States in their feeling that if we would only keep off the ocean and let them attend to the over-seas commerce of the world, we would be permitted to look after our interests on land.

Prof. J. Russell Smith, Ph. D., in the Ocean Carrier, published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York, 1908, chapter 5, page 321:

> The great German steamship companies are probably more nearly a part of the Government than are any other important lines in the world. They receive direct or indirect Government aid and are benefited by the great desire of Germany to be a sea power. A part of the subsidy is in the form of special railroad rates on export goods on the German railroads.

In 1904, when the authorizing of the Merchant Marine Commission was being considered in Congress, the European element in the New York Maritime Exchange took issue with the American shipping element for favoring this, and nominated a British shipping agent, Woolley by name—an Englishman living in the United States but a British subject—for president of the exchange, in an effort to defeat for reelection Capt. C. B. Parsons, an American shipowner and a Union officer in the Civil War. This British steamship agent Woolley stated his position as follows:

> We are opposed to the present president being reelected because he favors the control by American tonnage of the transport trade. He favors measures in Congress, you know, arranging things so merchandise can be shipped to the Philippines only in American bottoms. Now 90 per cent of the business is controlled by English tonnage, and, of course, we don't want to have that changed.

Of course, being a British subject, he did not want to have it changed.

Before the Merchant Marine Commission Mr. P. D. Todd, resident agent in Philadelphia of the Allan Steamship Line, of Scotland, said:

> I am a Scotchman by birth and a foreigner at the present time. I have applied for papers.

He said he was opposed to subsidies to American ships, adding:

> Objection has been taken to the term "A rose by any other name would smell as sweet," and whether we call it compensation or subsidy or bounty the principle remains unchanged.

Mr. Todd also opposed encouraging American ships through discriminating duties. He said:

> The question of discriminating duties is one which will not, in my opinion, appeal to the sense of justice of anyone engaged in the import and export trade of this country. The adoption of such a principle would act as a restraint to commerce, would savor of class legislation—where the few would be favored at the expense of the many—and would assuredly lead to retaliation on the part of those countries whose fleets were thus discriminated against. (Hearings before the Merchant Marine Commission at Philadelphia, May 26, 1904, pp. 380–386 of the report of the Merchant Marine Commission.)

J. Ernest Laidlaw, vice consul of Great Britain at Portland, Oreg., and a British ship brokerage firm of J. Laidlaw & Co. opposed a system of subsidies in the ordinary carrying trade and advocated free ships. (Hearings before the Merchant Marine Commission at Portland, Oreg., Aug. 1, 1904, pp. 1122–1134 of the report of the Merchant Marine Commission.)

H. Mosle, agent of the Norwegian and other foreign ships at Galveston, Tex., said he preferred foreign officers and sailors and was opposed both to subsidy and to discriminating duty of any kind. (Hearings before the Merchant Marine Commission at Galveston, Tex., Nov. 12, 1904, pp. 1489–1494 of the report of the Merchant Marine Commission.)

W. P. Ross, representing foreign steamship lines at New Orleans, declared that he was opposed to any subsidies to American vessels, except to mail ships, and was opposed to discriminating duties:

> Such a device as this would be quite inoperative, as there is nothing which is better understood among the foreign shipowners than ways and means of putting ships under whichever flags are required, and generally securing a subsidy in addition. (Hearings before the Merchant Marine Commission at New Orleans, La., Nov. 14, 1904, pp. 1542–1546 of the report of the Merchant Marine Commission.)

That is, a foreign subsidy.

W. G. Sickel, western freight agent of the International Mercantile Marine and of the Hamburg-American Steamship Co., Chicago, was opposed to subsidies, and contended that there was no need of more tonnage to carry our trade. (Hearings before the Merchant Marine Commission at Chicago, Ill., June 24, 1904, pp. 723–728 of the report of the Merchant Marine Commission.)

Fred W. Taylor, agent for chartered British steamships between Philadelphia and London, was opposed to subsidies and believed in free ships, free officers, free sailors, and the repeal of the American food scale, but if subsidies were given he would have them given to foreign-built ships. (Hearings before the Merchant Marine Commission at Philadelphia, May 26, 1904, pp. 334–344 of the report of the Merchant Marine Commission.)

On December 13, 1909, Herr R. Huldermann, general secretary of the Hamburg-American Line, published in the New York Herald a long argument against subsidies to shipping in America, where, he declared, "bill after bill is being brought into Congress to grant shipping subsidies."

Herr Huldermann published a misleading table of subsidies given by the principal nations of the world, and added:

> Apparently a very sound judgment of subsidies is to be found on both sides of the Atlantic. What the German shipping circles expect from the German Government is a constant watching of the subsidies movement abroad—

That is, in this country—> and especially a careful study of its new appearances by the German diplomatic representatives. Besides that, in dealing with new commercial treaties in future special stress should be laid on the stipulation that the German flag shall not be exposed to unfavorable treatment abroad.

> Last but not least, it is well worth careful consideration whether the great shipping nations should not be able to combine in preventing an unjust treatment of their flags by foreign Governments. Many important shipping questions have been dealt with in international negotiations—for instance, between England and Germany—with such favorable results that even an understanding as mentioned seems to be obtainable.

The correspondent of the Herald who sent Herr Huldermann's argument added:

> In any event, this one-sided argument—but one of many that agitate industrial circles on this side of the Atlantic in these days—proves the cause of the European interest that has its ears open as to the possibility of congressional action in this problem.

It will be noted that whenever we have attempted legislation in this country to rehabilitate the American merchant marine these agents of foreign steamship combines and consolidations have been on hand to protest against it and to secure space in the newspapers of the country in opposition to our proposed legislation. It has been an insolent and bad-mannered opposition, which ought to be rebuked.

On December 16, 1909, E. H. Outerbridge, a brother of A. E. Outerbridge, head of the Quebec Steamship Co., a British concern operating in the West India trade, opposed the proposition to build up an American merchant marine before the New York Chamber of Commerce, Secretary Root having advocated the ocean mail bill at the annual banquet of that organization.

On November 26 and 27, 1909, several American newspapers published a statement alleged to come from "important shipping interests who do not favor subsidy legislation." It was further stated that this had been prepared for distribution to all the Members of Congress. This statement dealt with the transportation of Navy coal and the transportation of cement and other materials to Panama. It estimated that a subsidy policy would cost $227,000,000 a year, and urged that a number of American companies owning foreign-built ships would naturalize them if a free-ship law were enacted.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator for a question merely.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator this question: As I recall, he was a member of the Merchant Marine Commission, which a few years ago investigated the question of the most practical method of rehabilitating the American merchant marine. Am I not right about that?

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire when that Merchant Marine Commission was created and what was its membership? The reason I ask this question is because I have an amendment which I propose to offer, which is now pending——

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator must not make a speech.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (continuing). Bearing upon that very question.

Mr. GALLINGER. A bill which passed both Houses of Congress January 4, 1905, created this commission.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. And who were the members?

Mr. GALLINGER. The members of the commission on the part of the Senate were the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN], and the then Senator from Florida, Mr. Mallory. The members on the part of the House of Representatives were Representative Grosvenor, of Ohio; Representative Minor, of Wisconsin; Representative HUMPHREY, of Washington; Representative Spight, of Mississippi; and the late Representative McDermott, of New Jersey.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator where this commission had its hearings and what was the purport of the testimony which the commission took?

Mr. GALLINGER. The report of the commission gives a statement of all the hearings that were held, and I find on looking at the report that the hearings are there summarized. On the north Atlantic, hearings were held in New York May 23 to 25, in Philadelphia May 26 to 27, in Baltimore May 28, and in Boston June 1 and 2. On the Great Lakes, hearings were held in Chicago on June 24, in Detroit on June 27, in Cleveland on June 28 and 29, and in Milwaukee on July 21. On the Pacific, hearings were held in Seattle on July 26 and 27, in Tacoma on July 28 and 29, in Portland on August 1, and in San Francisco on August 4 and 5. On the southern coast and Gulf of Mexico, hearings were held in Galveston on November 12, in New Orleans on November 14, in Pensacola on November 15, in Brunswick, Ga., on November 17, and in Newport News, Va., on November 19. Did the Senator ask me what was developed in those hearings?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I asked what was the purport of the testimony given to the commission.

Mr. GALLINGER. The commission summoned witnesses without any reference to their preconceived notions or their political views. It took testimony from a good many men representing foreign shipping interests. We called business men, we called newspaper men, we called bankers, and other classes of our people, including representatives of labor organizations. The hearings before that commission will be found in the three volumes of the report, which are very voluminous and covering every possible phase of the question that had been committed to this joint commission for investigation.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if I am not disturbing the Senator——

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is not disturbing me at all. I shall be glad to answer any question I can.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I wish to ask one or two more questions. Did the witnesses, as a rule, advocate the granting of a subsidy by the Government to American ships or did they propose to accomplish the result in some other way?

Mr. GALLINGER. The witnesses, so far as citizens of the United States were concerned, were quite unanimous in the view, which they stated frankly, that if we were to enter into competition with foreign governments in the over-seas trade the Government must in some way provide for the difference in the cost of construction and operation of American ships as compared with foreign ships. The entire question of the cost of building and the cost of operating ships was gone into and can be found in this testimony. Of course, the representatives of foreign steamship companies saw great objection to this scheme. They contended that we had ships enough, and very likely they were correct in that; but they were foreign ships, and they did not see any sense in the Government of the United States, which was doing a very profitable business on land, engaging in the business on the seas when other governments furnished adequate transportation. That is substantially the testimony.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator if the commission, of which he was the chairman, made a report to Congress; and if so, what it recommended?

Mr. GALLINGER. The commission did make a report, which I hold in my hand, and recommended a bill which was presented to both Houses of Congress. It is proper I should say that there was a minority report made. That minority report did not take issue with the general findings of the commission, because we had a most delightful commission, gentlemen who were always courteous and kind, so far as the opinions of the individual members were concerned. The minority report was signed, as I remember, by three members of the commission, recommending a discriminating-duties plan, which the commission had shown pretty clearly could not be made operative because of the unfortunate commercial agreements we had with some 30 nations of the world, and because of the fact that the products of the very countries to which we wanted to extend our trade were largely on the free list, so that a discriminating-duty policy would not operate favorably, as it did in the early days of the Republic, when almost everything we imported had a small import duty placed upon it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire whether anybody appeared before the commission to advocate the Government ownership and operation of ships?

Mr. GALLINGER. Not one single witness appeared there making any suggestion of that kind.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Did any member of that commission, after a full hearing and investigation of the subject, favor the Government ownership or operation?

Mr. GALLINGER. It never was discussed or suggested.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to ask the Senator in this connection, as I understand that he has gone into this subject at great length, to state what hearings have been held upon the present bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, that is a very pertinent and, I fear our Democratic friends will think, an impertinent question. The present bill was, if I may be permitted to refer to another body, heard there a part of two days, and the witnesses summoned to the hearing were two members of the body which held the hearing and the Secretary of the Treasury. There was not a single business man, there was not a single shipping man, there was not a single maritime lawyer, there was not a single farmer, there was not a single laboring man called to that hearing, in contradistinction to the hundreds and hundreds of men of all classes that the Merchant Marine Commission called to testify. As I understand the matter, to go a step farther, no hearing whatever was given by the Committee on Commerce of this body.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator without distracting his attention from the subject he is discussing, I desire to say that, so far as I know—and I am a member of the committee—I do not recall any hearing before the Committee on Commerce upon this bill, and the hearings before the House committee were most inadequate, and included only, so far as I know, the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that there were two Representatives of the House, both of whom, as I recall it, had bills of some kind on the subject pending before that body, who were also given an opportunity to make speeches. That was the extent of the hearing.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Before the House committee?

Mr. GALLINGER. Before the House committee.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Not before the Senate committee?

Mr. GALLINGER. Not before the Senate committee.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire another question in this connection. In view of the fact that there is very great opposition to this bill throughout the country, the leading newspapers of the country being filled with statements of the grounds of the opposition, and in view of the fact that it was understood at the time the bill was pending before the Senate committee that there was very serious objection to the bill, can the Senator enlighten the Senate and the country as to the reason why the Senate committee refused to grant a hearing to the people of the country who were so much opposed to the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I can only give my own opinion, which is worth just what it is worth. Had I been a member of the Committee on Commerce, as I was a few years ago, I should have very strenuously insisted upon hearings because of my strong personal interest in this question. I received several letters from constituents calling attention to the importance of hearings on this proposition that the President had made, but before they were received the bill had been reported, and hence I could not even make an application to the committee for a hearing.

I do not know any reason except, Mr. President, that the Chief Executive wanted this bill, and he and his confidential advisers, I suppose, prepared it and it was thought desirable to put it through under whip and spur, and hence the usual courtesy of hearings was denied to the American people. That is the only reason I can give.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I have turned to the minority report of the Merchant Marine Commission, and I find that it was signed by Senator Mallory, of Florida; Representative Spight, of Mississippi; and Representative McDermott, of New Jersey. I will repeat that so far as I can recall the issue that divided the majority and the minority of the commission was largely between the Government giving help directly to the shipping interests of the country and the proposition of the minority to return to the differential or discriminating duties of the fathers of the Republic.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator whether the principal objection to the proposition advanced by the minority, including Senator Mallory, of Florida, of discriminating tariff duties, was because of our treaty engagements and the fear that they could not be modified easily or satisfactorily at that time.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will state, Mr. President, that the Merchant Marine Commission filed a memorandum on that subject, which will be found in one of the three volumes, showing that unless those treaties were denounced, which they could only be by one year's notice from our Government, they stood in the way of returning to the differential-duties plan as obstacles that could not be overcome.

It will be recalled that in the present tariff law there is a section providing that 5 per cent differential shall be granted to goods imported in American bottoms. But it has been held up by the Department of Justice on the ground that it can not be put into effect while those treaties continue, and if I remember correctly the matter has now gone to the Supreme Court of the United States. However, the Merchant Marine Commission looked that matter over with great care, and, as I said a moment ago, in addition to the difficulties they found in these commercial agreements, which I think never ought to have been entered into, there was the other fact that in South America and Central America and the Orient, where we wanted to extend our trade, their products were largely either on the free list or at so low a rate of duty that the differential would not amount to very much.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask another question if I may be permitted. I do not know but that I could rise to a question of personal privilege upon the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire that if he had been a member of the Committee on Commerce he would have demanded an investigation.

Mr. GALLINGER (to Mr. SMITH of Michigan). Ask a question.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I want to say, if I may be permitted without interfering with the Senator——

Mr. GALLINGER. The danger is that the Senator may interfere with the Chair.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I shall trust to the Chair.

Mr. GALLINGER. I want the Senator to understand that I was called off the floor once to-day because I yielded to a statement on the part of another Senator, something which never before happened in the Senate of the United States from its organization until the present time. I was the first victim, and I do not want to be a victim the second time in the same day.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I will not interfere at this time, but I did protest and demanded an investigation—the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] and the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] as well as myself——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I must suggest——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But we did not succeed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I yielded for a question, and I am going to be very careful, because I want to finish what I have to say to-day, and then on some other day I will make my second speech, if I get an opportunity.

I think I might, Mr. President, at this point, and it is a diversion, commend to the Members of this body that report of the Merchant Marine Commission. It was not a partisan matter. There were, it is true, a couple more Republicans than there were Democrats upon it, but we took the matter up in a broad and, I think, a patriotic way and had our meetings cover the entire country.

While it is a little out of the way, I want to suggest, Mr. President, that we were not an extravagant commission. It was not a junketing commission, but a working commission. We returned to the Treasury about half the appropriation that had been made, and the commission had only one person employed to assist in the work.

I think I might well say at this point that the testimony in those volumes is startling, if Senators will take the trouble to read it; and I think I can furnish them to any Senator who has interest enough to examine them for the purpose of enlightenment. Two gentlemen in the city of Cleveland gave testimony to the effect that they had traveled twice around the world. One of them said he went twice as far as the direct route around the world would have carried him, and during that entire time he never saw the American flag on a merchant ship. He did see the flag on a few yachts owned by American millionaires and, I think, in a few instances on vessels of war. The matter was so startling, so convincing, that some of us at least felt that Congress ought to be willing to make some sacrifice, even though it took a little money out of the Treasury of the United States, to remedy that condition.

The Merchant Marine Commission introduced a bill which passed this body by a large majority, as I remember it, but in the other body it failed of passage, and that bill fell by the wayside, as several other bills have that I have offered since that time. As I remarked the other day, one bill passed this body—not a comprehensive subsidy bill but a bill enlarging the subvention under the mail act of 1891—which would have put lines upon several very important routes on the sea. It passed this body without a recorded vote, by consent. It went to the other body. An inconsequential amendment was attached to it. It came back here, and I moved to concur in the amendment, and it was defeated by Democratic methods such as we on this side of the Chamber are now charged with using in the discussion of this bill. That was the nearest we have come during my membership in this body to securing legislation on this question.

Now, Mr. President, I have shown—and I think I have conclusively shown—that there is no such thing as a shipping trust in the coastwise trade of the United States, and that, in the nature of things, it is impossible for a trust of that kind to exist. You might just as well try to organize a trust among the owners of automobiles, because those thousands and thousands of ships are owned by different parties and by thousands and thousands of stockholders, and there is no chance of organizing a trust.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey for a question.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator made a statement a little while ago, for which he gave figures, showing the percentage of vessels in the coastwise traffic owned and controlled by shipping combinations and railroads. He arrived at that percentage by contrasting the number of ships owned by such combinations with the total tonnage of the coastwise shipping, I suppose.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES. Has the Senator any figures to show the relative proportion of steam coastwise traffic owned and controlled by shipping combinations and railroads and that which is not so owned and controlled?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes. There are 330 ships owned by railroads and combinations, and over 14,000 steamships, in addition to that, in the coastwise trade.

Mr. HUGHES. Is the Senator sure of his figures? Those figures do not include sailing vessels?

Mr. GALLINGER. No; there are over 24,000 vessels, all told.

Mr. HUGHES. I should like the Senator to tell us where he gets that information.

Mr. GALLINGER. I got it from the report——

Mr. HUGHES. Does that appear in his report?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think probably it does not. I take it, as I recall it, from a report of the Commissioner of Navigation.

Mr. HUGHES. There are 24,000 steamships in the coastwise trade?

Mr. GALLINGER. No. There are 14,000 in addition to the 330 that are controlled by combinations and railroads.

As I have heretofore observed, the apparent determination to place foreign vessels in the coastwise trade is most unfortunate, and I regret, Mr. President, that in this bill, if it shall become a law, there will be some of our coastwise ports open to foreign steamships. There is no earthly need for it; there is no excuse for it; because the coastwise shipping of the United States, the greatest in the world, is fully supplied with vessels for all the purposes of transportation.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit a question, I should like to ask him to point out to the Senate what possible harm would come to the coastwise traffic if these ships in the foreign trade, which the Senator is so anxious to encourage, were permitted to touch at more than one American port on a trip? Does the Senator think that it is necessary for the well-being of the coastwise traffic, even, that a ship flying the American flag, engaged in foreign commerce, should not be permitted by our laws to touch at two American ports in succession?

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, there is more excuse for that than there was during the last session for the attempt to open the entire coastwise trade to the ships of the world. I do not know that I would enter into a controversy with the Senator on that subject beyond saying, as I said a few days ago, that it was the camel's nose getting into the tent, and after a while we would have the camel in there, because I know very well the feeling there is on the part of some Senators on the other side of the Chamber to open the coastwise trade of the United States to ships of all the nations of the earth.

Mr. HUGHES. That is not my understanding of the proposition that was up in the Senate some time ago. But take the case of the present shipping bill; if it should become a law, the United States Government then, according to the argument of the Senator, would be owning and operating a line of ships. Does the Senator think it would be just and proper to permit laws to remain on the statute books which would prevent a ship owned and operated by the United States Government and flying its flag in the foreign trade from going from one American port to another? Do I understand the Senator to say that in his desire to encourage the coastwise merchant marine he does not think it necessary to continue that legislation which prevents American ships in the foreign trade from going from one American port to another?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I did not say that. I said there was more argument to be made on that hypothesis than there was when the attempt was made to open the coastwise shipping to all the ships of the world; but I have one other objection to that, and that is, that I do not believe we ought to open any industry of the United States to the competition of the Government of the United States. The Government of the United States has the Treasury back of it to sustain these ships. The Government of the United States can run them at a loss or at a profit, as the case may be—they will be run at a loss—but I do not think it very wise to put the coastwise ships of the United States in competition with a Government-owned fleet when there is not any need of doing so; when we have adequate ships in the coastwise trade; when, in fact, we are transferring some of them to the over-seas trade now. Therefore I would use that as a suggestion, if not an argument, against doing what is proposed in the bill in that regard; but it is not as serious as some of the propositions which have been made. I will say to the Senator from New Jersey that I will look into it more carefully. I confess I have not looked into it with the care that I ought to have done in a matter involving any phase of this important question.

Now, Mr. President, as I said, I think it unfortunate that the attempt should be made to invade the coastwise trade with foreign ships. The ships of the coastwise trade have rendered a most important service during the existing war by transferring many of their vessels to the foreign service because of a depressed volume of domestic business. I will ask to append a partial list of American steamers and sail vessels recently chartered for foreign voyages, most of them having been transferred from the coastwise to the foreign trade.

I will not stop to read the names of all these ships. There are 48 of them in number. They range from ships of nearly 4,000 tons to ships of less than 1,000 tons. Some of them are sail and some of them are steam. The first ship, the Antilla, is a steamship of 2,174 tons, a general-cargo ship. It runs between New York and Copenhagen. There is another one, the Gulf Light, a steamer of 3,202 tons, which runs from Galveston to Bremen. I am very glad, Mr. President, that at last we have got a steamship going out of the port of Galveston. That is a great port, upon which the Government of the United States has expended about $12,000,000 in deepening the harbor and removing obstructions; and until this vessel engaged in the over-seas trade from Galveston the entire commerce of that great city, which is enormous, was carried in foreign steamships, except one lone American schooner, which had the American flag at the masthead. I repeat, I am glad at last that we have transferred one ship from the coastwise trade to that trade, so that Galveston does not send all its products to foreign countries under the flags of foreign nations.

A large number of these steamships go to Bremen, some of them go to Copenhagen, some of them go to Rio de Janeiro and Buenos Aires and the River Plate, in South America, and one steamer of 3,272 tons, the Newton, goes from Galveston to Rotterdam—another steamer, in fact, that goes out of Galveston carrying the American flag.

The Steana Romana, of 3,059 tons, goes from Savannah to Bremen and carries cotton; the Annie M. Reid, a bark, goes from New York to Australia; and so on. So the coastwise trade has made a very large and important contribution to our over-seas trade. I am very glad it has done that; but it has done it simply because, in consequence of the industrial depression in the country which exists to-day, they happened to have some ships that were not employed in the domestic trade.

I ask leave to insert in my remarks this list in full without reading.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission to do so will be granted.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, there are one or two other matters to which I wish to call attention, but I shall hurry through as rapidly as possible. I want first to take up the matter of the Panama Canal Steamship Co., which has been discussed here two or three times.

It has been argued with great earnestness that there has been a net revenue from the Panama Railroad Steamship Co. of $314,219.36 during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914. I have several times called attention to the fact that the figures were fictitious and would not bear careful analysis. For the purpose of ascertaining the real facts in the case the following letter was addressed to Mr. E. A. Drake, vice president and manager of the Panama Railroad Steamship Co.:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., January 30, 1915.

Mr. E. A. DRAKE,
Vice President and Manager Panama Railroad Co.,
24 State Street, New York City.

DEAR SIR: It is stated in a report of Secretaries McAdoo and Redfield on the ship-purchase bill that in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, there was a net revenue from the Panama Railroad Steamship Co. of $314,296.36; that "these net revenues are truly net; that is to say they are net after maintenance and depreciation, including extraordinary repairs, are charged against the property. This depreciation on the ships owned by the company is 6 per cent per annum, which is the practice of the best private lines and is in excess of the depreciation charged by many privately owned lines."

Will you kindly inform me at the earliest possible date—

1. Whether this net revenue of $314,296.36 represents the net earnings of the two steamships owned by your company alone or represents this and in addition the net earnings of the three or four larger steamers put at your disposal by the Isthmian Canal Commission and the War Department?

2. Is this depreciation of 6 per cent allowed only on the two steamships owned by your company, or is it allowed also on the larger ships of the Isthmian Canal Commission and the War Department which you are employing?

3. Will you kindly inform me also what payment you have made for insurance, if any, on the ships employed by the company, and what allowance you have made, if any, for interest on the capital invested or the value of the property?

These facts are of importance in view of the discussion of the ship-purchase bill in the Senate. I would appreciate a full and immediate reply.

Sincerely, yours, J. H. GALLINGER.

Mr. Drake's reply was as follows:

PANAMA RAILROAD CO.,
21 State Street, New York, February 1, 1915.

Hon. J. H. GALLINGER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I own receipt of yours of the 30th ultimo, and take pleasure in submitting the following replies to the three specific inquiries that you make concerning the operation of the Panama Railroad Steamship Co.:

1. Revenue of $314,296.36 represents the net earnings of all the steamers operated by the Panama Railroad Steamship Line. These steamers can properly be grouped as follows: Owned by the Panama Railroad Co., steamers Advance and Allianca; under charter from the Panama Canal, steamers Colon and Panama; owned by the United States Government and placed in our service for the specific purpose of carrying cement for the Panama Canal, steamers Ancon and Cristobal. We are required to make all ordinary and extraordinary repairs to the steamers owned by the Panama Canal and the Government, and to keep same in a high state of efficiency, in order that we may return the vessels in as good condition as received, ordinary wear and tear excepted.

2. A depreciation charge of 6 per cent is made on the original value of this company's steamers Advance and Allianca of $762,713.62, and the fund for its amortization now amounts to $337,113.59; no allowance is made for interest on capital invested.

For steamers Colon and Panama charter hire is paid on their ledger value of $1,312,000, on the basis of 8 per cent—that is, 4 per cent interest on capital cost and 4 per cent for depreciation—and, in addition, a like 8 per cent on structural improvement and betterments, amounting to $416,476.74, representing a total annual charge of $123,243.96 plus the cost of their maintenance, as above stated. Since October 31, 1910, that charter hire has been applied to the reduction of this company's rate to the Isthmian Canal Commission (the Panama Canal) for transporting cement to the Isthmus by steamers Ancon and Cristobal and in payment of other services rendered by them in connection with canal construction work.

3. No marine insurance has been carried on any of the company's steamers or vessels employed in its line since March 4, 1910, when congressional enactment directed its discontinuance.

For further particulars I beg to refer you to marked pages 40 and 43 of this company's annual report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, and to page 71 of the supplemental report, giving similar information for the four ensuing months to November 1, 1914.

Trusting this gives the information desired,

Respectfully,

E. A. DRAKE,
Vice President.

Mr. President, these facts appear from the letter of Mr. Drake: First, that a depreciation charge of 6 per cent has been regularly made on the two small, old steamers of the Panama Railroad service, the Advance and Allianca; that on the larger steamers Colon and Panama, chartered from the Panama Canal Commission, both charter money and depreciation used to be paid, but that since October 31, 1910, it has not been paid, but has been applied to the reduction of the cement freight rates—presumably to bring this as low as the figure of competing private vessels. It also appears that on the large steamers, the Ancon and Cristobal, chartered from the War Department, no charge for depreciation has been made, though the ships are supposed to be kept in repair.

Another important fact is that no marine insurance has been carried on any of the six steamers since March 4, 1910.

Regular charges for depreciation and insurance must be provided for by all private steamship companies. If insurance had been paid at 3 per cent on the six steamers of the Panama service in the year 1914, the cost would have been as follows:

Ships.	Valuation.	Insurance at 3 per cent.
Ancon and Cristobal	$1,500,000	$45,000
Colon and Panama	1,312,000	39,360
Advance and Allianca	400,000	12,000
Total	3,212,000	96,360

In this statement the valuation of the Advance and Allianca is set, not at the original value ($762,713.62) of the ships, which are now quite old, but at the conservative sum of $400,000, which perhaps more nearly represents their real present value.

Figuring depreciation at 4 per cent per annum, this would be on the four larger ships of the Panama Line as follows:

Ships.	Valuation.	Depreciation at 4 per cent.
Ancon and Cristobal	$1,500,000	$60,000
Colon and Panama	1,312,000	52,480
Total	2,812,000	112,480

That is to say, the factors of insurance and depreciation, figured as private steamship companies have to figure them, would have cost the Panama Railroad Steamship Co. in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, the sum of $96,360 and $112,480, or $208,840. The net earnings of the entire fleet of the Panama Railroad Steamship Co. in the fiscal year are stated by Mr. Drake to have been $314,296.36. If the insurance and depreciation charges, which were not allowed for by this Government-owned company but would have to be allowed for by any private company, were subtracted from the net earnings, the result would be $105,456.36, or a little more than 3 per cent on the valuation of the six steamers, $3,212,000.

Mr. Drake, testifying in 1913 in the case of the United States versus the Hamburg-American Line and others, is quoted as follows:

Question. Mr. Drake, in your opinion how much more does a steamship line have to make to earn the equivalent of 6 per cent on a railroad investment?

Answer. A steamship line has to earn from 12 to 20 per cent to make it equivalent to 6 per cent earned by a railroad.

In other words, if proper and necessary charges for insurance and depreciation were made in the fiscal year 1914, two-thirds of the ostensible net profit of $314,296.36 would disappear, and the business would prove a very unsatisfactory investment. But the Panama Railroad Steamship Co. has not always returned an apparent net profit. There are years when its business has been conducted at a heavy loss. Taking the three years 1912, 1913, and 1914 the result would be as follows:

Years.	Profit.	Loss.
1912		$201,761.13
1913	$221,489.92
1914	314,296.36
Total	535,786.28	201,761.13

Subtracting the loss in 1912 of $201,761.13 from the profit in 1913 and 1914 of $535,786.28, there remains an apparent net revenue for the three years in question of $334,025.15. But if the proper and necessary charges for depreciation and insurance on the six steamers of the company's fleet had been made in each of these three years at the rate of $208,840 a year, these charges would have amounted for the three years to $626,520, which would have absorbed the entire apparent net profit for those three years of $334,025.15, and would have left a deficit for the three years of $292,494.85, as follows:

Insurance and depreciation, three years, 1912, 1913, and 1914	$626,520.00
Apparent net profit, 1912, 1913, and 1914	334,025.15
Actual deficit, 1912, 1913, and 1914	292,494.85

Only insurance and depreciation have thus far been considered. If to these charges there should be added an allowance of, say, 5 per cent on the capital invested or the valuation of the six ships—$3,212,000—the deficit would, of course be considerably increased; indeed it would be increased $160,000, making a total deficit of $453,094.85 instead of a surplus of $314,296.36, as has been erroneously claimed. But even as it is, without making any allowance for interest, the result is a demonstration that the business of the Panama Railroad Steamship Co., though it has been highly favored in the carrying of Government supplies and official passengers and employees, has been conducted for the three years at a serious loss to the Government.

In saying this no imputation is made against the managers of this Government steamship company. The president of the company is Col. George W. Goethals, the distinguished chief builder of the canal, and there can be no doubt that Mr. Drake and his associates are faithful and honorable public servants. The ill success of the company is due not to any lack on their part but to the inherent defects and difficulties of Government ownership and operation of a commercial business.

Mr. President, whenever the statement is made that foreign Governments are subsidizing their ships not only by the direct payment of money but in various other ways, the suggestion is made that the subsidy paid is really nowhere near as great as stated. To show the tremendous advantage that foreign ships have over American ships in this regard, I desire to call attention to the exact facts regarding the Cunard subsidy, which I take from the report of the Commissioner of Navigation for the year 1903, page 48.

I have heretofore, on one or two occasions, Mr. President, called attention to this enormous subsidy that was given to the Cunard Line, but the reply has sometimes been that they had to pay it back. Let us see.

On the part of the British Government the Cunard contract is made jointly by the Admiralty, representing the navy department; by the board of trade, corresponding to our Department of Commerce; and by the postmaster general. The public purposes of the contract recited in the preambles are the maintenance and improvement of British steamship lines to the United States; the control by the Admiralty, when desired, of the Cunard Fleet; and the transportation of the British mails.

The basic articles of the new Cunard contract are the following:

3. (1) The company shall forthwith cause to be built for it in the United Kingdom, with all due dispatch, two steamships of large size, capable of maintaining a minimum average ocean speed of from 24 to 25 knots an hour in moderate weather, suitable in all respects to maintain and develop the company's line between Liverpool and New York, or other ports in Great Britain and the United States of America.

10. His Majesty's Government shall advance to the company a sum equal to the cost to the company of the two steamships referred to in clause 3 hereof, but not exceeding in any event £2,600,000.

Which is, in round numbers, about $13,000,000.

The estimate of the first cost of these steamers, £1,300,000 each, was based on the investigations of a special commission of the Admiralty. That commission reported the first cost, indicated horsepower, and annual subsidy required to maintain commercially fast British ocean steamers, as follows:

Average speed (knots).	First cost.	Engine power (I. H. P.).	Annual subsidy.
20	£350,000	19,000	£9,000
21	400,000	22,000	19,500
22	470,000	25,500	40,500
23	575,000	30,000	67,500
24	850,000	40,000	110,500
25	1,000,000	52,000	149,000
26	1,250,000	68,000	204,000

The speed basis is not for a measured mile or a short distance but for the voyage of 3,000 miles across the Atlantic. The annual subsidy to make good commercial losses is based on a 10-year contract.

By the article just quoted the British Government agrees to advance the first cost, £1,300,000, of each of the two fastest steamers which can be built. This amount is to be repaid by the company in 20 annual installments of £65,000 each, beginning with the end of the first year after the second of the two steamers has made her first voyage. Beginning with the first voyage of each steamer the British Government is to pay the company an annual admiralty subvention of £75,000 for each of the two steamers, or £150,000 a year when both are in full operation. This £150,000, however, includes the present admiralty subvention for the Campania, the Lucania, and other existing steamers of the fleet, under the agreement of October, 1902, amounting to about £20,000. The new admiralty subvention for the two new steamers is thus virtually £130,000, or £65,000 apiece—a sum just sufficient to equal the annual installment of the company's repayment of the Government's advance.

By paragraph 9 (e) of the contract interest shall be at the rate of 2¾ per cent per annum. At this rate the average annual interest on the principal of £1,300,000, payable in 20 years, will be £17,875. Besides the admiralty subvention of £150,000 already mentioned the Cunard Co. is also to receive £68,000 for carrying the mails once a week from Queenstown to New York. This service will require four steamers, and the postal subsidy is accordingly at the rate of £17,000 a steamer. As the two new steamers will presumably carry more than the average amount of mail, in effect the mail subsidy is calculated to pay interest on first cost, as the admiralty subvention was calculated to repay the principal of first cost advanced by the Government.

By this agreement in effect the British Government agrees to build and give to the Cunard Co. the two best steamships Great Britain can produce, and the company agrees to operate them at its own cost. The Government supplies the capital; the company meets operating expenses. The company's chance for profits depends on passenger receipts exceeding operating expenses, excluding first cost of the steamers. The Government's return for its investment is:

1. British transportation of British mails.
2. The employment of naval reserves on the Cunard steamers.
3. The possession of a fleet of auxiliary cruisers and transports, without the cost of maintenance, including insurance, wages, repairs, etc.
4. The reassertion of British preeminence on the North Atlantic, threatened by the rapid development of the two great German lines.

By the third schedule of the contract the British Government has the right to purchase outright any Cunarder for a sum equal to the value of the vessel at the time of her purchase, plus 10 per cent as a bonus to the company. The present value of each steamer of the fleet, it will be noted, has been fixed in the contract, the Lucania and Campania, built in 1893, for example, each being valued in September, 1902, at £356,839. Depreciation is to be allowed at the rate of 6 per cent annually, but the value of a steamer may be appreciated by the installation of new boilers and engines. Although the British Government, as shown, pays the first cost of the new steamers, it can purchase them from the company only by a payment of 10 per cent bonus above their value, as an insurance to the company against loss consequent upon interrupted traffic.

The total annual subsidy to the Cunard Line specifically provided for in the contract consists of £150,000 ($729,000) for admiralty services and £68,000 ($330,480) for the mails; in all, $1,059,480. Paragraph 20 of the second part of the contract contains, however, the following provisions looking toward the maintenance of a complete Cunard semiweekly trans-Atlantic service:

If in consequence of additions to its fleet the company shall at any time establish a new fast weekly midweek service between Great Britain and the United States of America—that is to say, a service performed by vessels of a speed of 18 knots and upward per hour—and the postmaster general shall, under the powers conferred by this clause, send by means of such new service a regular mail to the United States of America which shall be equal in weight, on an average of 12 months, to not less than 10 per cent of the average weight of the mail sent each week by a mail ship under this agreement, then the postmaster general shall make such additional payment to the company for the advantage thus obtained as—regard being had to the other payments to the company under this agreement—may be agreed upon, or, failing agreement, settled by arbitration under clause 35 hereof.

The amount of the subsidy or "mail pay" under this paragraph is not fixed, but the paragraph is a pointed illustration of British policy to dispatch British mails entirely by British steamers, even if British steamers are slower than competing American and German mail steamers. With the semiweekly mail line in operation, the Cunard Co. will doubtless receive about $1,100,000 from the British Government annually. The United States pays substantially the same sum for our eastbound trans-Atlantic mails, the Cunard Co. receiving of late years over $200,000 annually from the American Post Office.

The only American trans-Atlantic mail contract now in force was made with the American Line for 10 years under the act of 1891. Under that contract the maximum annual subsidy is $757,000 for four steamers, or on the average $189,000 a steamer. As already shown, the Cunard contract is so arranged that the company is assured that the Government will meet the entire first cost, including interest, of the two new steamers. Two new steamers were built in the United States under the American contract in 1893–1895 at a cost each of $2,500,000, in round numbers. During the 10 years of the American contract each of these steamers, if in full operation, might thus draw $1,890,000. If the company undertook, as does the Cunard Co., to repay the first cost in 20 annual installments, during the 10 years of the contract $1,250,000 must be set aside for the purpose. The British Government requires only 2¾ per cent interest from the Cunard Co.; the American Co. pays 5 per cent interest on its mortgage bonds. At this rate—assuming it were proposed to retire the bonds in 20 years—the interest charges for the 10 years of the contract will amount to $937,500. This sum added to $1,250,000 set apart for amortization amounts to $2,187,500 paid out, compared with $1,890,000 subsidy received.

At the end of the 10-year American contract the company's payments for first cost and interest are thus nearly $300,000 more than the maximum subsidy receivable, while the company has still to meet half of the first cost and interest thereon of a steamer adapted virtually to one line of trade. The disparity between the 20-year Cunard contract and the 10-year American contract is lessened by the fact that Congress admitted two British-built steamers to American registry in order to give life at all to an American trans-Atlantic mail system. It is increased, on the other hand, by the higher wages paid on the American than on the British lines.

It will be seen, Mr. President, from this recital that the British Government put up substantially $13,000,000 to build two steamships for a private company. The provision was that it should be paid back in annual installments with interest at the rate of 2¾ per cent; but pending that the British Government gave mail contracts to those ships of an amount equal to the annual payment that was to be made, so that as a matter of fact the company pays back nothing, but has the two ships practically as a free gift. If any such proposition as that should be made to the United States Senate, I know what would be said about it.

Let me now briefly call attention to the experience of the Government in buying ships during the Spanish-American War.

On January 9, 1900, the Senate passed a resolution of inquiry calling upon the Secretary of War for information as to the names of the persons and corporations from whom ships were bought or chartered for service incident to the War with Spain, together with the true value of those ships as shown by Lloyd's Register. The first part of the resolution of inquiry was responded to in detail, but as to the true value of the ships the report sidesteps the proposition by stating that Lloyd's Register did not show the true value of ships, so that no one to this day knows what difference existed between the true value of the ship and the price which the Government paid for it.

I cite the fact that I am about to state for the purpose of showing that our former experience in purchasing ships has not been a remarkable success.

From Senate Document No. 250, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, it will be seen that the War Department expended the sum of $8,074,455.20 in the purchase of vessels for the Army transport service incident to the War with Spain. Of this amount $4,200,000, more than one-half, was turned over to Bernard N. Baker for eight ships furnished by him. After the vessels were purchased from Mr. Baker it required an expenditure of $2,427,996.55 to repair and fit them for the service. In the case of one vessel costing $660,000, the sum of $526,964.68, nearly 80 per cent of the purchase price, was spent on "refitting and repairs." In the case of another vessel costing $200,000, refitting and repairs amounted to $230,612.95, about 115 per cent of the purchase price.

The experience that the Government had in the purchase of ships for transport service during the Spanish-American War, as above detailed, is certainly not very reassuring so far as the proposition that the Government shall again engage in that business is concerned. We ought not to purchase ships that can not easily be converfed into naval auxiliaries, and it follows that probably no cargo ships that are now for sale are so constructed and that the cost of refitting them will probably be a repetition of our experience in 1898.

Some of those ships remain in the service of the Government as transport ships. Others of them were sold for less than 50 per cent of their original cost, and I do not think we want to buy many more ships after that experience.

If those who are promoting this bill entertain the notion that foreign ships purchased by the Government are to be operated at a less cost because the officers are foreigners, they are doomed to disappointment. It will be recalled that the emergency act of August 18, 1914, authorized the President to suspend the law which requires that the officers of American vessels shall be American citizens. The President did suspend that requirement so that most of the foreign-built vessels admitted to American registry have retained their British, German, or Norwegian officers, as the case may be. With a view to ascertaining whether those officers were employed at the same wages that they were employed when the ships were under foreign flags or whether they demanded American wages, I addressed a letter to the managers of steamship lines in which those foreign vessels were employed making inquiry concerning the matter, and have received replies from three of them which I herewith append. It will be seen that immediately upon coming under the American flag the officers demanded American wages, so that the ships will be navigated by the Government at a higher cost than foreign ships engaged in the same trade.

In a letter from the foreign shipping department of the Standard Oil Co. it is shown that the total wage bill of one of their steamers under the German flag was $936.10 per month, while under the American flag, the men having demanded American wages, it was $1,765, or almost twice the amount that was paid when they were under a foreign flag.

The Munson Steamship Line make a similar return. They say:

> There is a very decided increase in the wages of officers and crews on foreign-built ships which are admitted to American registry and in cases where the crews of such ships have been signed on abroad for a period of 12 months; immediately the registry is changed the crews either demand the American scale of wages or their discharge and transportation to their home port.

W. R. Grace & Co. make a similar statement, showing that the American wages are 50 per cent above the British wages, but that immediately upon the British ships taking out American registry a demand was made for increased wages to conform to the American standard.

Without reading, I will insert the letters to which I have called attention.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letters referred to are as follows:

STANDARD OIL CO.,
New York, February 16, 1915.

The Hon. J. H. GALLINGER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: In reply to your letter of February 10, we would answer your inquiries as follows:

1. The foreign ships we have transferred to the American flag have been confined to vessels formerly operated under the German flag. In these transfers we have followed the practice of substituting Americans for the German officers, engineers, and crews. This has made it necessary to pay the American scale of wages on these vessels. Below we give you a comparison of the wages paid on the same steamer under each flag:

Steamship Washington (German), now steamship Brindilla (American).

Total wage bill under German flag, per month	$936.10
Total wage bill under American flag, per month	1,765.00
Increase under American flag	828.90

So that the wages under the American flag show an increase of 88.55 per cent.

2. It is difficult to make a categorical answer to this question. Our reply will have to be more or less general. The standard of living on steamers under the American flag is quite different from foreign flags, resulting in increased expense. It is also difficult to obtain and retain experienced men for American ships, and this is another item that contributes to increased cost by frequent replacement of men at out-of-the-way ports. We have also found that in the case of petty officers, sailors, and firemen the same men sailing under the American flag demand and receive much higher wages than they are willing to accept under foreign flags. Another increased item under the American flag is brought about by the fact that the American measurement laws result in a larger measurement for the steamer than under foreign registry. This particular item is in suspense at the moment, but when again put into force will result in the steamer paying higher port charges, a good portion of which will be paid to foreigners, as they will be subject to tonnage dues in foreign ports based on the American registry.

Respectfully,
D. T. WARDEN.

NEW YORK, February 11, 1915.

Mr. J. H. GALLINGER, Chairman Conference of the Minority,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: We have the honor of replying to your esteemed favor of the 10th instant.

1. There is a very decided increase in the wages of officers and crews on foreign-built ships which are admitted to American registry, and in cases where the crews of such ships have been signed on abroad for a period of 12 months, immediately the registry is changed the crews either demand the American scale of wages or their discharge and transportation to their home port.

2. Beyond the increase of wages the operations of loading and discharging, port charges, etc., are practically the same on a foreign as on an American ship.

Very respectfully, yours,
MUNSON STEAMSHIP LINE,
A. H. BROMELL,
Vice President.

NEW YORK, February 13, 1915.

Hon. J. H. GALLINGER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: We have your letter of February 10 in reference to foreign steamers transferred to American flag.

We have been operating American and British steamers side by side for some years, and we estimate difference in cost of operation to be as follows:

	American, per month.	British, per month.
Wages	$1,970	$1,342
Victualing	803	649
(American steamers have larger net tonnage measurement than British, and, as tonnage and light dues are paid on net register, that is against the American boat.)
As dues vary in the different ports of the world, the difference in money is difficult to state, but may be estimated at	35	.....
(This tonnage item will not go into effect on foreign steamers transferred to American flag until Aug. 18, 1916, by reason of President's proclamation.)
American steamers require annual inspection, while British steamers are inspected each four years; estimated extra cost by reason of annual inspection	25	.....
	2,833	1,991

The cost per month extra for an American boat thus being $842.

The extra cost of victualing is not by statute, but by reason of less economy on American steamers.

On British steamers which we recently transferred to American flag the foreign crews struck for American wages the day of transfer, and received them. As soon as foreign crews are replaced by Americans we will have the increased cost of victualing.

We trust this gives you the information which you desire.

Yours, very truly,
W. R. GRACE & CO.,
N. BOWIE, Vice President.

Mr. GALLINGER. In this connection it is interesting to note the difference in wages on trans-Atlantic mail steamers as taken from the report of the Commissioner of Navigation, the comparison being made between the American steamship St. Louis, the British steamship Oceanic, and the German steamship Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse. The British and German ships have both been lost during the present war, the Oceanic off the north coast of Scotland and the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse in battle off the coast of Africa, but doubtless the comparison holds good as between the American and other foreign steamships of the same class.

Rating.	American—St. Louis.		British—Oceanic.		German—Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse.
	Number.	Total wages.	Number.	Total wages.	Number.	Total wages.
Deck officers	6	$430.00	7	$359.64	6	$221.34
Deck force	45	1,129.58	44	967.14	53	656.99
Engineers	29	1,595.00	25	1,455.57	34	1,069.53
Firemen	136	4,860.75	153	3,676.59	179	2,879.80
Purser, etc	4	242.50	5	230.85	5	138.04
Culinary	27	680.09	21	493.29	25	486.95
Stewards	125	2,179.04	162	2,530.36	191	2,156.27
Miscellaneous	8	189.13	10	177.88	7	106.63
Total	380	11,306.09	427	9,891.32	500	7,715.55

This shows that the Americans had a total number of persons employed of 380, the British of 427, the Germans of 500. The American wage was $11,306.09, the British $9,891.32, and the German $7,715.55.

It will be noted that the smaller and slower American steamship, with a smaller crew, thus pays a much larger amount for wages than the competing foreign vessels. The comparison would be more exact if the vessels were precisely alike, with the same crews. The crew of 427 men on the British Oceanic was paid at the rate of $9,900 per month in round numbers. A crew of the same number, performing the same duties, if paid at the corresponding rates of wages on the American steamship St. Louis, would receive as nearly as may be $12,500 a month. A crew of the same number, performing the same duties, if paid at the corresponding rates of wages on the German Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, would receive as nearly as may be $6,800 per month. The United States consul notes that indirectly the pay on the North German Lloyd Line is increased by the insurance fund and by clothing to some of the crew. The annual contribution to the North German Lloyd insurance fund, $26,200, when apportioned among 10,000 employees of the company, amounts to about 20 cents each a month and does not affect the facts already mentioned. The gift of a new uniform once in six months to each of the petty officers and deck force, about 60 men on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, can not involve a large sum. The two items might add about $200 a month to the pay roll if converted into wages, but they are to be regarded rather as disciplinary measures to retain men in the company's service. Of the Oceanic's crew of 427 men, 68 are members of the British naval reserve, under retainers from the British Government.

Mr. President, a new bill has just come over from the other House. While many of the Democratic Members declared that they were opposed to that bill, it will be observed that almost all of them were whipped into line, and it is equally significant that the Republican vote in opposition to the bill was unanimous. So far as I can discover, the measure passed by the House is equally as obnoxious as the bill that we have been discussing in this body, and I will venture to express the hope that it will fail of passage when it is brought before the Senate for consideration.

As the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT] on yesterday very wisely said, it would seem to be our duty to drop the shipping bill and proceed to the consideration of the appropriation and other important bills that are now waiting for our consideration, the passage of which is of much more consequence to the interests of the country than the shipping bill. What boots it that the President of the United States and members of his Cabinet are urging the passage of the shipping bill in the face of the fact that a tremendous majority of the people of the country are opposed to it and that there is every reason to believe that if enacted into law it will result in harm rather than good. Our relation to the terrible war now raging in Europe is sufficiently acute at the present time, and we should exercise the greatest possible care not to do anything that could by any possibility lead us into serious trouble with the belligerent nations, which may possibly result if the purposes of the proponents of the bill are carried out.

Mr. President, I have concluded for the present, and I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, if the Senator will withhold that motion for just a moment, I desire to give notice that following the morning routine business to-morrow or, if we have no morning hour, some time during the day on to-morrow, I shall address the Senate on the ship-purchase bill.

DISTRICT EXCISE BOARD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Pending the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire that the Senate adjourn, the Chair announces the appointment of the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON] on the excise board investigation in the place of the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], who has resigned.

The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 18, 1915, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 17, 1915.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou great Jehovah, King of Kings and Lord of Lords, our Father, "who will have all men to be saved and to come unto the knowledge of the truth," open now the portals of our souls to the things which make men wise and strong, pure and brave, good and great, that we may inherit the kingdom prepared for the faithful, now and always after the manner of the Christ, the world's great Redeemer. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE FORREST GOODWIN, OF MAINE.

Mr. PETERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the order which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That Sunday, February 21, 1915, be set apart for services upon the life, character, and public services of Hon. FORREST GOODWIN, late a Member of this House from Maine.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing the caption of a letter referring to petitions of a hundred thousand names signed on behalf of food supplies depots in the United States. I wish to state, Mr. Speaker, I have no idea in the world of publishing those names.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER] is not well this morning and can not be present. He has asked me to ask unanimous consent for the printing of the bill S. 5259, with House amendments, as the bill passed the House last night.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama, at the instance of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. ALEXANDER], asks unanimous consent for the printing of the bill S. 5259, with House amendments. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, and I will not object, of course as soon as this bill goes to the Senate it is printed with House amendments. I will not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter addressed to me on the subject of peace on behalf of the Chester Preparative Meeting of Friends.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter in reference to peace. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The letter is as follows:

Hon. THOMAS S. BUTLER.

ESTEEMED FRIEND: When the cry of war and rumors of war are filling our land, we feel it to be a fitting season to urge upon the Nation the vital necessity of the universal adoption of peace principles. The advocacy of peace has always been one of the foundation stones of the Society of Friends. We fully believe that in the dissemination of these principles individuals, as well as nations, can best promote the interests of the country and also maintain a closer adherence to the injunction of the Divine Master to live in brotherhood with all mankind. We therefore ask that thou, as our Representative, will use thy influence against increased armament and for maintaining the neutrality of the Nation in the present crisis.

Thus by the prevalence of Christian love and good will to man our Nation may demonstrate that the government we seek shall be a government whose subjects are free, indeed, redeemed from the captivating lusts whence come war and fighting.

BESSIE C. MARTIN.
DORA A. GILBERT.

(Signed on behalf of Chester Preparative Meeting of Friends.)

CORRECTING CERTAIN ERRORS IN PRINTING, COMMITTEE ON WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. GREGG. Mr. Speaker, there were two resolutions which passed the House referring claims to the Court of Claims, and there was a mistake in each of them. I have introduced two resolutions to correct the mistake, and I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on War Claims be discharged from the further consideration of those resolutions and they be taken up for immediate consideration. The first is No. 733.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 733.

Whereas by error in printing the report of the House Committee on War Claims upon House resolution 591, Sixty-third Congress, second session, which passed the House February 10, 1915, that resolution purports to refer the claims listed therein to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts and conclusions of law under section 111 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," and the said claims should have been referred to the said court under section 151 of the said act: Therefore be it

Resolved, That House resolution 591, Sixty-third Congress, second session, be corrected and amended so as to refer the claims therein specified, with all the accompanying papers, to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts and conclusions of law under section 151 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, do I understand that House resolution 591 has heretofore been passed by the House?

Mr. GREGG. Yes; it referred claims to the Court of Claims under the wrong section of the Judiciary Code, and this is simply to correct that error.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 734.

Whereas by error in printing the report of the House Committee on War Claims upon House resolution 532, Sixty-third Congress, second session, which passed the House July 17, 1914, that resolution purports to refer the claims listed therein to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts and conclusions of law under section 111 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," and the said claims should have been referred to the said court under section 151 of the said act: Therefore be it

Resolved, That House resolution 532, Sixty-third Congress, second session, be corrected and amended so as to refer the claims therein specified, with all the accompanying papers, to the Court of Claims for a finding of facts and conclusions of law under section 151 of the act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, on the 8th of January President Wilson delivered a speech at Indianapolis, and on the 15th Hon. James E. Watson, formerly an honored Member of this House, replied in the same city to that speech. I ask unanimous consent to insert Mr. Watson's speech in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a speech made by Hon. James E. Watson, of Indiana, a former Member of the House, at Indianapolis on January 15, in answer to a speech by the President of the United States made at Indianapolis on the 8th of January.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will withhold his objection. We did not object to printing the President's speech.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not think that men who enter into general debate with the President should have their speeches printed in the RECORD. I object. I do not think it is fair. Some one who is now a Member of the House ought to reply.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects.

PENSION BILLS.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the conference reports on the bills H. R. 19545 and H. R. 20562 and agree to the same.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Conference report on the bill (H. R. 19545) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

The conference report was read.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1407).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 19545) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 12, 13, 25, 33.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, and agree to the same.

BENJ. F. SHIVELY,
CHARLES F. JOHNSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

On amendment No. 1: The Senate proposes to increase the amount paid to David Jewell from $22.50 to $24. The House concurs because of additional evidence furnished the Senate committee.

On amendment No. 2: The Senate proposes to increase the amount to be paid Samuel S. Van Wye from $22.50 to $24 per month. The House concurs because of additional evidence furnished the Senate committee.

On amendment No. 3: The Senate proposes to increase the amount to be paid to Ludlow Walker from $24 to $30 per month. The House concurs because of additional evidence furnished the Senate committee.

On amendment No. 4: The Senate proposes to increase the amount to be paid Nathaniel T. Hoover from $40 to $50. The House concurs because of additional evidence filed with the Senate committee.

On amendment No. 5: The Senate proposes to increase the amount to be paid to Rufus G. Blanchard from $40 to $50 per month. The House concurs because of additional evidence furnished the Senate committee.

Amendment No. 6: The House concurs. Claimant is dead.

On amendment No. 7: The Senate proposes to increase the amount to be paid to John F. Messick from $22.50 to $24 per month. The House concurs because of additional evidence furnished the Senate committee.

Amendments Nos. 8 and 9 are changes in phraseology.

Amendment No. 10 is to correct a typographical error.

Amendment No. 11 is to correct an error in printing.

On amendment No. 12: The Senate recedes. The claimant was shown to be totally disabled and helpless.

On amendment No. 13: The Senate recedes. Claimant was the wife of the soldier during his military service.

On amendment No. 14: The House concurs. This was an error in the rate.

On amendment No. 15: The House agrees. Claimant is pensioned by special act and is not helpless.

On amendment No. 16: The House concurs in the recommendation to increase the amount from $22.50 to $24, additional evidence having been filed with the committee.

On amendment No. 17: The House concurs, the claimant having a short service.

Amendment No. 18 is a change in phraseology.

Amendment No. 19: Claimant is dead.

Amendment No. 20: House agrees to reduce the amount proposed to be paid to Emma L. Ackley from $24 to $20. This is to conform to the rules of both Houses.

Amendment No. 23: The House concurs in the reduction of the amount from $24 to $20 to conform to the rules of both Houses.

Amendment No. 24 is a change in phraseology.

Amendment No. 25: The Senate recedes. While claimant had short service, he is shown to be totally disabled.

Amendment No. 26: House agrees. Claimant's physical condition does not warrant a higher rate than $30.

Amendment No. 27: House agrees. Claimant is dead.

Amendment No. 28: House agrees. This is a change in phraseology.

Amendment No. 29: House agrees. Claimant is dead.

Amendments Nos. 30, 31 and 32 are needless changes in phraseology.

Amendment No. 33: Senate recedes. It was shown that the claimant married the soldier in good faith and lived with him as his wife for 23 years, until his death.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the conference report? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next one.

The Clerk read as follows:

Conference report on the bill (H. R. 20562) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

The conference report was read.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT (NO. 1408).

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 20562) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 5.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 4146. An act granting certain lands to school district No. 44, Chelan County, Wash.; and

S. 5449. An act to make Pembina, N. Dak., a port through which merchandise may be imported for transportation without appraisement.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bill:

H. R. 17168. An act to authorize the North Alabama Traction Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Tennessee River at or near Decatur, Ala.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

H. R. 19376. An act confirming patents heretofore issued to certain Indians in the State of Washington; and

H. J. Res. 391. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of Commerce to postpone the sale of fur-seal skins now in the possession of the Government until such time as in his discretion he may deem such sale advisable.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to bills of the following titles:

S. 2518. An act granting to the town of Nevadaville, Colo., the right to purchase certain lands for the protection of water supply; and

S. 5629. An act for the relief of certain persons who made entry under the provisions of section 6, act of May 29, 1908.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

On request of Mr. HAYDEN, by unanimous consent, the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 21377) to encourage the reclamation of certain arid lands in the State of Nevada, and for other purposes, and the same was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the Clerk will call the committees.

When the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries was called.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I remember——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, as the pension appropriation bill was under consideration and it is desirable to pass the appropriation bills as speedily as possible, I ask that the business in order under the rule to-day be dispensed with so that the House may proceed with the pension appropriation bill.

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I thought those gentlemen would object to appropriating money for pensions to the old soldiers of the Civil War.

Mr. MANN. We put it over one day for you, and I guess we will put it over another day.

REGISTER OF FOREIGN-BUILT VESSELS.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, has the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries been called?

The SPEAKER. Yes; it has been called.

Mr. HARDY. Then I call up the bill S. 2335, as follows:

An act to provide for the register and enrollment of vessels built in foreign countries when such vessels have been wrecked on the coasts of the United States or her possessions or adjacent waters and salved by American citizens and repaired in American shipyards.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4136 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be reenacted and revised to read as follows:

"SEC. 4136. The Secretary of Commerce may issue a register or enrollment for any vessel wrecked on the coasts of the United States or her possessions or adjacent waters, when purchased by a citizen or citizens of the United States and thereupon repaired in a shipyard in the United States or her possessions, if it shall be proved to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Commerce, if he deems it necessary, through a board of three appraisers appointed by him, that the said repairs put upon such vessels are equal to three times the appraised salved value of the vessel: Provided, That the expense of the appraisal herein provided for shall be borne by the owner of the vessel: Provided further, That if any of the material matters of fact sworn to or represented by the owner, or at his instance, to obtain the register of any vessel are not true, there shall be a forfeiture to the United States of the vessel in respect to which the oath shall have been made, together with tackle, apparel, and furniture thereof."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] is recognized for an hour.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill passed by the Senate and reported by the House Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, authorizing the American registry of vessels that have been wrecked on the coasts of the United States or her possessions or adjacent waters and salved and purchased by American citizens, and repaired in the shipyards of the United States when the repairs amount to three-fourths of the value of the ship as completed or repaired. That was the law of the United States up to 1906, with this difference, namely, that this bill provides quite a number of safeguards against fraudulent applications for registry that were not in the old law. The old law was repealed in 1906 on the suggestion of the department or Bureau of Navigation, as I take it and as I remember it from the hearings, largely because the department called on to administer the law seemed to object to the difficulty and to the labor of investigating applications made to them under the law. And upon the repeal of that law that labor was transferred to the House of Representatives and the Senate and their various committees, it being thereafter the custom for those who had vessels repaired in the United States to make their applications for registry to Congress, as they were compelled to do. It shouldered off on the committees, particularly the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, the labor of making a great many investigations, and it resulted in the fact that sometimes vessels, if there was enough pull and push before committees of Congress and before Congress, would get registered when they had been repaired, and others, despairing under the tiresome effort and tedious delay, proceeded to have partial repairs made in this country and take the vessels abroad and finish the repairs there.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. Certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I want to ask a question about the bill. Does the gentleman prefer that I wait or that I ask it now?

Mr. HARDY. Ask it now.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I wanted to know whether there was anything in the bill that would prevent the abuse, of which my distinguished friend is well aware, that occurred under the old law. For instance, where a vessel was tied up at the wharf, under a ruling of the former Attorney General they counted the care as repairs, so that the gentleman will probably remember that under that decision they would take any vessel, repair it, and tie it to the wharf long enough until keepers' services and cost of looking after the vessel would bring it within the rule to be registered.

Mr. HARDY. I think if any such practice was permitted or authorized by the rulings of the administrative officers it was outside of the provisions of the old law, but this law provides that the repairs put upon the vessel must be equal to three times the appraised salved value of the vessel. And if there is any possible misconception or misunderstanding about terms, I can not see it. The bill says, further:

Provided, That the expense of the appraisal herein provided for shall be borne by the owner of the vessel.

Provided further, That if any of the material matters of fact sworn to or represented by the owner—

And this is new, I think, in the law—or at his instance, to obtain the register of any vessel are not true, there shall be a forfeiture to the United States of the vessel in respect to which the oath shall have been made, together with tackle, apparel, and furniture thereof.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I know. Where does that differ from the wording of the old law? I do not know whether my friend from Texas ever saw that ruling or not, but I have seen it. It is a ruling of the Attorney General that the cost of looking after the vessel—watchmen's fees, and so forth—are considered a part of the repairs. We all agreed when that matter was before the committee that that was an evil that ought to be remedied, and I had hoped in this bill there would be some provision that would prevent a recurrence of it.

Mr. HARDY. Is that the question you wish to have answered?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, if there was any such ruling made by the department under the old law, it seems to me it was utterly without warrant of law, for the old law said that if it shall be proved to the satisfaction of the Secretary that the repairs put upon such vessel are equal to three-fourths of the cost of the vessel when so repaired, and so forth.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. There was such a ruling made.

Mr. HARDY. I understand the gentleman is of that recollection. But we add to this law this further statement:

That if any of the material matters of fact sworn to or represented by the owner, or at his instance, to obtain the register of any vessel are not true, there shall be a forfeiture to the United States.

I do not know how to make the language more plain than that. But I want to call the attention of the Members of the House to the fact that the result of the repeal of that law has simply been to transfer to the committees of Congress the labor of investigating, and I expect that there is more opportunity to get vessels in through the violation of law by that haphazard kind of investigation than there is through a fixed law.

In other words, I believe that the law ought to be fixed, and that if a vessel is repaired in the United States and three-fourths of its entire value has been put upon that vessel in the repairs in the shipyards of the United States that vessel ought to be admitted to registry in the United States as a matter of right and by a steady or a uniform law and not by the whims and opportunities of the action of Congress.

In addition to that, I would say that I am informed that at least a number of vessels that have been wrecked on our coast can now be repaired and admitted to our register in a few weeks, and thereby aid in supplying the deficiency in transportation that we have to-day. And, further, I wish to say that I believe it is in the interest of the shipyards themselves that a vessel wrecked on our coast, if repaired in our yards at a cost of three-fourths of its value, should be admitted to registry in the United States, because if that is not done those ships, if possible, will be taken to foreign shipyards, to be repaired there, and the labor of repairing would thereby be lost to our shipyards.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FOSTER). Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. Yes.

Mr. TOWNER. I will say to the gentleman that I notice the language used in this bill, "That section 4136 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be reenacted and revised to read as follows," and so forth. Is it intended that this section shall be an entire substitute for the old one?

Mr. HARDY. Yes, sir.

Mr. TOWNER. Then, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this is a very slovenly and a very unwise method of doing it. In other words, if we intend to repeal the old statute, we ought to expressly state so.

Mr. HARDY. The old statute is already repealed.

Mr. TOWNER. Then why should we say we reenact it?

Mr. HARDY. Because that is what we want to do.

Mr. TOWNER. The condition is this: That only means this, that if there should be only part of the old statute that is not expressly reenacted in this new one it is not repealed. If it is intended to repeal the existing statute, we ought to say so and reenact a substitute.

This is what I have in mind: It has been many times decided by the Supreme Court of the United States—indeed, they hold the rule perhaps more strongly than any of the States—that you can not repeal a statute by implication. It must be done expressly. It must be either expressly declared that the old statute is repealed or there must be such a necessary repugnance that it will by reason of such repugnance effect a repeal of the repugnant clause of the old statute. But if there should be any clauses of the old statute that are not expressly repealed and are not expressly repugnant to the terms of the new statute, then those clauses of the old statute are in existence still.

I am objecting to this because of the slovenly method by which those statutes that are not intended to be expressly repealed are not so stated, because the gentleman will admit that it will lead us into many embarrassments.

Mr. HARDY. I want to say to the gentleman, Mr. Speaker, that, from a purely literary standpoint, the criticism may be a good one. The wording may be slovenly; but I will say to the gentleman that this bill comes to us from the Senate, and unless there should be some very valid reason for changing it, and thereby throwing it into conference and causing double delay on the part of both Houses again, I would not like to change it.

And then I want to call the gentleman's attention to another fact. This is not existing law. It is a law that has been repealed heretofore. I am aware that if you say nothing of the repeal of an existing statute and do not directly repeal it, the enactment of another law in partial conflict with it would only repeal that former statute in so far as the conflict existed. The gentleman is correct in the general principles he states, but I do not think there is any question about that. But this being a law once in effect and subsequently directly repealed, and now no longer in existence, the Senate bill provides that it be "reenacted and revised to read as follows."

Now, there can be nothing in the law reenacted except what is reenacted and embraced in the words following the words "as follows," because the old repealed section is so reenacted and so revised as to read "as follows." Now, in effect that seems to me to have a very definite meaning.

Mr. TOWNER. I will say to the gentleman that I do not quite agree with him. If this statute numbered 4136 is not now in existence, if there is not any such statute now on the statute books, then we should not say that we reenact it. We should only go to work and say what we propose to pass now.

Mr. HARDY. I think, as an original proposition, the gentleman is correct. That method would be the better practice.

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; but I want to call my friend's attention to this point: It is not a mere literary objection. It is a substantive objection, because when we say that we reenact a statute and the terms of the reenactment do not agree with the terms of the original statute, then only in so far as the reenacted statute shall be expressly repugnant to the original statute will it necessarily repeal it, and if there are clauses in the old statute that are not in this, and there is no express repealing clause, we are in danger of having a confusion of law, and that is not a mere literary matter.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, to obviate that I have the old statute here before me.

Mr. TOWNER. I do not know what the terms of the old statute are.

Mr. HARDY. I will read it to the gentleman, so that he can see that there is no possibility of misunderstanding. The old statute reads "the Secretary of the Treasury." This revision reads "the Secretary of Commerce." Now, the old statute says, "may issue a register or enrollment of any vessel built in a foreign country."

Mr. TOWNER. Yes, if wrecked off the coasts.

Mr. HARDY. Yes; "wrecked on the coasts of the United States." It leaves out the words "built in a foreign country." Then it says, "or her possessions or adjacent waters." "Whenever such vessel shall be wrecked in the United States," and this law adds, "or adjacent waters." Then it goes on, "And shall be purchased or repaired by a citizen of the United States, if it shall be proved to the satisfaction of the Secretary that the repairs put upon such vessel equals three-fourths of the cost of the vessel so repaired," and so forth.

Mr. TOWNER. Let me call my friend's attention to the fact that this is a notable example of the very thing that I am calling attention to.

Mr. HARDY. What section of the old law does the gentleman think is left in force?

Mr. TOWNER. I do not know; but this is evidently not a reenactment of the old law.

Mr. HARDY. It is a reenactment and a revision.

Mr. TOWNER. It is a revision, exactly; but if it is intended as a substitute, why do you say, "The old statute is reenacted"? And if there is anything in the old statute you do not want retained in the new, it will be placed there by this statement that you reenact the old statute. If there is not anything now in existence that is the law, then we should not say that we reenact a repealed or an obsolete or inoperative statute. And if we mean that there is a statute now in existence, and we want to change it and put a new one in place of it, then we should say frankly that we repeal the old statute, and that this is enacted in lieu of it.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I still recognize the literary merit of the gentleman's criticism. But a statute that has been repealed can not be amended until it is reenacted, and the Senate very properly proposed to reenact an old statute then repealed; that is, they reenacted it as revised, so that when reenacted, as revised, it shall read as follows; then follows the law enacted. Now, the more the gentleman discusses it, the more it appears to me that, even as a literary production, the Senate bill is not very wrong. There is a statute that has been repealed. It is to be reenacted, and in reenacting it, it is revised so as to read as follows. What could be clearer? I am sure that no court under the sun would fail to find the meaning of this statute, and to find it perfectly valid..

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman give an interpretation of the words used in line 5, page 2—

Appraised salved value of the vessel.

The repairs are to be equal to three times the appraised salved value of the vessel. What does that mean? Does it mean that if a vessel that has been wrecked carelessly or by design is purchase by some one for $100 the purchase can by the expenditure of $300 get an American registry?

Mr. HARDY. There is a provision here in line 3—

Through a board of three appraisers appointed by him, that the said repairs put upon such vessels are equal to three times the appraised salved value of the vessel.

Mr. MOORE. I think that differs——

Mr. HARDY. I do not think the old law required that, but simply said three times the value. This is intended to enable the department to have its own board of appraisers pass on it, so that the value of the vessel is to be determined by the board of appraisers of the department, and in that respect it is a great improvement on the old law.

Mr. MOORE. The report of the Commissioner of Navigation for 1905, which is quoted in the minority report of the committee——

Mr. HARDY. You will find the old law in the Senate report.

Mr. MOORE. The report of the Commissioner of Navigation for 1905 contains this statement, that the registry is to issue to such vessel—

If it shall be proved to the satisfaction of the commissioner—

That is, the Commissioner of Navigation—that the repairs put upon such vessel are equal to three-fourths of the cost of the vessel when so repaired.

That language is essentially different from the language you use in this bill, and I wanted to know what the distinction was.

Mr. HARDY. The old law was, if it was proved to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury——

Mr. MOORE. The old law of 1905 required that the Commissioner of Navigation should find that the repairs put upon the vessel were equal to three times its value, but in this bill you say that the repairs put upon such vessel are to be equal to three times the appraised salved value of the vessel. I take that to mean that it gives the department greater latitude than it has heretofore had in the matter of discretion with regard to the issue of the registry.

Mr. HARDY. The only difference is that the former law gave the department authority to issue the registry if the repairs amounted to three-fourths of the value, without any appraisal. This requires it to be three times the appraised value, and provides the officers to make the appraisal.

Mr. MOORE. The appraisal proposition is new.

Mr. HARDY. It is an additional restriction.

Mr. MOORE. That brings us back to the term "appraised salved value of the vessel." I should like to get the meaning of that from the gentleman in charge of the bill.

Mr. HARDY. I can not give it any further than that it says that the Board of Appraisers shall appraise the value.

Mr. MOORE. Is that the law or the bill?

Mr. HARDY. That is the bill. That is an additional safeguard.

Mr. MOORE. Exactly, and because of that I wanted to get the meaning of the words "appraised salved value." Because, if the gentleman will permit me for a moment, a vessel may be run ashore by a captain who designs to wreck the vessel. A foreign vessel having been so run ashore it might incidentally raise the question of insurance upon the cargo. But when it comes to the salving of the vessel, and you state in the bill that the appraised salved value of the vessel shall prevail, the question naturally arises, what is the appraised salved value, because the vessel itself, in the sand or on the rocks, may not be worth a hundred dollars to anybody; but if, by waiting for a tide to carry it off and float it again, the vessel is salved, would the appraised value be determined then?

Mr. HARDY. If the gentleman will permit me, I want to reserve some of my time. I will simply say that I can not understand that language any further than its clear import would seem to me to indicate—that is, when the vessel is wrecked and salved these appraisers are appointed, and they assess the value before any repairs are put upon it. Now, if the ship had three times that salved value put upon it in repairs, it would be entitled to registry under the bill.

Mr. MOORE. I want to be fair to the gentleman and say that the cost of wreckage also enters into the question. If a $100,000 vessel is purchased by somebody, wrecker or otherwise, for $100, and $300 is spent upon it in repairs, it would probably meet the requirements of this bill, and it is a question whether the bill ought to pass. I call this to the attention of the gentleman because it will be discussed during the debate.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I used?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has used 25 minutes.

Mr. HARDY. I will take five minutes more. It seems to me the intense self-interest of the shipbuilders of the country in the repeal of the old law has overreached itself. They are actually so afraid that some timber or piece of material in the hull of a vessel wrecked on our coast may become a part of the vessel under register that they sought the repeal of the law and secured it, and Congress has been bothered from that day to this with applications. Now, here is a plan proposed, where a vessel wrecked on our coast is ready to be repaired in our shipyards, which would furnish work for American labor, they would be unable to take it to a foreign yard to be repaired, but it is repaired here in an American yard, and they do not want it entitled to register, although it is three-quarters built in the United States. It seems to me that the self-interest of these people has pushed itself on the people of the country, to the detriment of the commerce of the country, and that their greed is insatiable.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARDY. I can not yield now; I want to reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I presented minority views on this bill, and I wish to call the attention of the Members of the House to the fact that when this statute was created, on December 23, 1852, it was created for the purpose of securing the admission of foreign-built wrecks to the coastwise trade. The statute was repealed February 22, 1906, and authority was given to the Congress of the United States to act upon all requests made for demands for register. I can see no reason for reenacting this statute. It takes from Congress the power of publicity that is allowed by the law now in existence; the law now provides for inquiring into every case where the vessel applies for a register on account of repairs that have been made. To carry this matter back to the Department of Commerce, as it would be by the reenactment of the statute, would have the effect that American registers could be issued without any public hearing, when at present there is a public hearing and all parties interested have an opportunity to appear and present the facts, which subsequently would be reported to the Congress for conclusive action thereon.

I know that a great many people believe that this repeal of existing law would mean the upbuilding of the American merchant marine. My experience has convinced me that the various wrecking companies in this country will be the chief beneficiaries of this contemplated legislation, and the proposed legislation would be detrimental rather than beneficial to the American merchant marine. These wrecked vessels are sure to be repaired in an American shipyard. It would not pay to take the vessels across the water, and if it did not pay nothing is to be gained, as is suggested by those who favor the reenactment of the repealed statute. Nothing is to be gained by the enactment of Senate bill 2335, because there is no other place except in America where with economy and safety these wrecked vessels would be taken and repaired. Consequently they would be compelled to have these vessels rebuilt in American shipyards.

Every nation protects its coastwise trade. Our forefathers with their great foresight and wisdom established the coastwise trade of the United States in 1787, and wisely decreed that it should be reserved for American-built and American-owned vessels, and with far greater wisdom provided that their officers and crews should be American.

This great bulwark and protection to our coast has justified during the space of 127 years the sacrifices made by the early pioneers and the succeeding generations to maintain this great civilian arm for our defense against the approach of all foreign invaders and against the peace and prosperity of the Nation.

The coastwise trade affords a school of experience for those who desire to follow the sea. We can not hesitate as patriots, as we ought to be, to throw around the coastwise trade in our own country the protecting arm of the Congress in order that we may preserve to coming generations this bulwark of safety created more than a century and a quarter ago.

I should be derelict to my duty if I did not call the attention of Members of the House to the importance of the most careful consideration of the effect which the removal of the power which the Congress now possesses to protect the vessel owner, who has constructed his vessel under the regulations provided under our existing maritime laws, of American materials in American shipyards by American labor and American wages against the foreign-built vessel.

Mr. LEVY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. LEVY. Under the present law they have no right, even if two-thirds destroyed, to be admitted to the American register?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Yes; they have a right to be admitted to American registry but not to the coastwise trade. Any old hulk can get admission to the American registry now, but vessels thus admitted are not permitted to enter the coastwise trade, and there is not a single reason why they should be. I assert that the proposed transfer of power is against the best interest of our country and contrary to the spirit of our institutions.

The report of the majority is very limited. It makes no explanation of the effect of this bill, and I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that on December 14, 1905, when the recommendation was made by the department that this statute should be repealed, it was stated that at the time the statute was enacted, in 1852, there was relatively very little difference in the cost of building wooden sailing vessels in general use here and abroad, and it did not then especially injure but aided American shipbuilding; but that in the time of steel steamers it brings about a very different condition, and only in a very few instances where the damages are relatively inconsiderable could such wrecks be partially repaired in the United States and then sent abroad for completion of repairs. They recommended that this change be made at that time. I also desire to call the attention of the Congress to the fact that the chairman of the Committee on Commerce in the other body wrote a letter to the Department of Commerce asking for the views of that department upon this bill, but the views expressed by the department were not included in the report of the majority and I desire to read them for the information of the House. I call especial attention to the following copy of a letter written to the Hon. JAMES P. CLARKE, chairman of the Committee on Commerce of the United States Senate, dated May 15, 1914, written by Hon. E. F. Sweet, Acting Secretary, who was formerly a Member of this House. That letter is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
Washington, D. C., May 15, 1914.

SIR: I have received your letter of January 15, inclosing S. 2335, to provide for the register and enrollment of vessels built in foreign countries when such vessels have been wrecked on the coasts of the United States or her possessions or adjacent waters and salved by American citizenship and repaired in American shipyards.

Complying with your request for such suggestions as I may deem proper touching the merits of the bill and the propriety of its passage, I have to say:

Section 4136, Revised Statutes, which this bill proposes to reenact and revise, embodied the provisions of the act of December 23, 1852, which was repealed on February 22, 1906. The report of this department recommending its repeal may be found in Senate Report No. 114, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session.

Foreign vessels wrecked on the coasts of the United States or adjacent waters are usually taken to American shipyards for repair, and the bill, accordingly, will not appreciably increase the opportunities for employment in American shipyards. American registry is usually sought in such cases to secure for the repaired wreck the privilege of engaging in the coasting trade, now limited to vessels built in the United States.

While the department favors measures to upbuild the American merchant marine, it doubts the propriety of trying to attain this end by adding repaired foreign wrecks to our coasting fleet in preference to new vessels built in the United States.

Respectfully,

E. F. SWEET,
Acting Secretary.

Hon. JAMES P. CLARKE,
Chairman Committee on Commerce,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Does not the gentleman think that the letter that he has read from the Assistant Secretary plainly indicates the reason why they do not want this change made? Does it not indicate to the gentleman that the Acting Secretary does not want this additional work imposed upon his department, and is not that the reason for his opposition?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to reply to that. I do not see any indication of that in a single line or word or thought expressed in the letter. I call attention to the letter of Hon. Victor H. Metcalf, the former Secretary of Commerce and Labor and a former Member of this House, to show that this letter of the Department of Labor under the present administration is in accord with the views expressed by Mr. Metcalf, who was a member of President Roosevelt's Cabinet. The views of the two representatives of the Cabinet are in accord, and I have expressed that in the report that I have made, as follows:

The views of the Department of Commerce under the present administration seem to be fully in accord with the views of the administration of former President Roosevelt in 1906, and these concurrent views, if carefully taken into consideration, ought to aid the Congress in determining to defeat the proposed legislation.

I can not see any reason at all for this bill excepting that it takes away from the publicity that is provided, as the law now is, of having the matter fully considered by a committee of this House and carefully gone into, and it also provides a chance for proper consideration in the Senate. I can not see any reason for giving the authority back to the Department of Commerce, which does not want it and ought not to have it, and which, under its provisions, could quietly admit these vessels to American registry; and I believe that what is really behind the bill is a desire on the part of some individuals to quietly carry out something that ought to be done openly, which should have full consideration given to it. I do not think this House, after all of the talk of a desire for publicity, should suppress the chance to go fully into the entire question of the construction of a vessel and the means that are used for her repair and rehabilitation.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Yes; for a question, but not for a speech.

Mr. GORDON. This bill simply authorizes the admission to registry of vessels owned by Americans which have been repaired to three-fourths of their total value in American shipyards.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. It refers to foreign-built vessels which an American may see fit to buy and repair. They might have an American owner when they want to get registry.

Mr. GORDON. Who is being hurt by such a course as that except this coastwise shipping monopoly?

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Suppose it is the coastwise shipping trade. I say that the United States should take care of its coastwise shipping trade as every other nation does of its coastwise shipping trade. I am not one of those who wants to haul down the American flag. I believe in keeping it up and in defending the institutions and rights and privileges of this country against any foreigner, I do not care who he is.

I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be recognized in my own right.

The SPEAKER. Whenever the gentleman from Massachusetts takes his seat.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington is recognized for an hour.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire if we can not agree on some length of time for debate. I supposed that an hour on a side would be enough, and that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] could control that hour and divide it as he saw fit. I would like to reach some agreement.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I think we will have no trouble so far as I am concerned if we can reach an agreement on another matter, and I am inclined to think the gentleman will agree to that if he will listen to me now for a moment.

Mr. MOORE rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. MOORE. To endeavor to enter into this agreement that is being made between the two gentlemen. Since the gentleman suggests that there be an arrangement as to time, I want to state that I would like to have some time.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to enter into any negotiations just now, but I probably shall as soon as the gentleman will answer me a question or two. In the report of the majority it says practically that this bill reinstates the old law as it stood up to 1906, which ought never to have been repealed. The language of the old law was:

The Commissioner of Navigation may issue a register or enrollment for any vessel built in a foreign country whenever such vessel shall be wrecked in the United States and shall be purchased and repaired by a citizen of the United States, if it shall be proved to the satisfaction of the commissioner that the repairs put upon such vessel are equal to three-fourths of the cost of the vessel when so repaired.

Now, that portion, "that the said repairs put upon such vessel equal to three times the appraised value," is the same. Now, I was a member of the committee at the time that repeal took place, and I remember very distinctly the reason why, and that was this: Under the old law—and I think my distinguished friend from New York was probably on the committee at the time—the principal reason was that a system of fraud had grown up under the construction the Attorney General applied as to what were repairs. I remember very distinctly that the Attorney General gave an opinion whereby watchmen's fees were counted in as repairs, so that all they had to do was to take one of these old vessels and tie it up at a wharf until the watchmen's fees amounted to sufficient to get a registry. That is one case; and the Attorney General decided under the law that they had a right to do that. Now, in the report, reading from the report made by the then Department of Commerce and Labor, it says:

Since 1856 the Attorneys General of the United States have construed nearly every phase in the ambiguous act just quoted, and in consequence the little words above are far from conveying the precise meaning of the act. Furthermore, it was passed at a time when nearly all the world's shipping was of wood, and the difference in the cost of building in this country and abroad was practically inconsiderable.

Now, that same language has been construed, and they will go right back, and we will have that over again. They not only counted the watchmen's fees, but they would take one of those old wrecks and refurnish it, and that refurniture that went into that vessel was counted as repairs, and thereby they evaded the law. Those are strong reasons why it was repealed, but I am not at all certain, if this law is so amended so as to avoid that particular feature, that it would be better than the special acts we have. I recognize much of the force in what my distinguished friend from Massachusetts said. We get publicity, but at the same time we escape a great deal of annoyance. I would ask the gentleman from Texas whether he would not accept an amendment of some kind that will prevent this very thing that caused the trouble before.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I very seriously object to any amendment, for the reason that would mean the killing of the bill.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Well, then, Mr. Speaker, if we are going to have that insisted upon, I will make the point of no quorum present. If we are to go back to this old system, that led to fraud and trouble before, we will have to have more Members here to consider it. I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington makes the point of no quorum present and reserves the balance of his time. There is no use in trying to count, as evidently there is no quorum here.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I suggest a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will lock the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this call 265 Members—a quorum—responded to their names.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Washington rise?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I desire to continue my remarks. I had the floor when I made the point of no quorum and I ask for recognition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman reserved the rest of his time. Does he wish to use it now?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes; I wish to use a part of it now.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman, as I understand it, lost the floor when he reserved the remainder of his time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman did not lose it. He had the right to the rest of his hour.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I believe I have a right to the rest of my hour.

The SPEAKER. Of course, the gentleman has.

Mr. HARDY. Then I ask for recognition for the rest of my time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows; but the gentleman from Washington asked for recognition before the gentleman from Texas did. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. HARDY. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARDY. My understanding was that when the gentleman rose he had an hour.

The SPEAKER. He did.

Mr. HARDY. If he sat down, reserving the balance of his time, he then for that time lost the floor?

The SPEAKER. He lost it as long as he was sitting down. The gentleman from Washington stands precisely on the footing of the other gentleman, who got an hour and reserved his time.

Mr. HARDY. Now, then, the question I wanted to ask was, having reserved his time, if somebody else rises and is recognized by the Chair, can he take it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. HARDY. Before the gentleman from Wisconsin? I thought the Chair had recognized the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BURKE].

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman is mistaken about it. Of course, we are all sort of woolgathering this morning and can not remember very well [laughter], but the recollection of the Chair is that he recognized the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. HARDY. I do not want to raise any question about it, but I think the notes will show that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BURKE] was recognized first.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Wisconsin as soon as the gentleman from Washington concludes his remarks.

ATTENDANCE OF MEMBERS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes to make one statement to the House. The session is rushing to a close and business is crowding, and when the bell rings for a call of the House Members ought to come over here. Now, day after day this overflow of Members down in front of the Speaker's desk after the regular calling of the roll practically amounts to a third roll call. Therefore the Chair hopes that the gentlemen will get over here promptly.

REGISTER OF FOREIGN-BUILT VESSELS.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago a point of no quorum was made in the House. There were not many Members on the floor. The roll call was ordered and a quorum appeared. Yesterday there was distributed throughout the House on the Democratic side a card which I think ought to go in the RECORD in connection with the lack of a quorum this morning. It reads as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., February 16, 1915.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Speaker CLARK requests me to say to you that he expects every Democrat to be in constant attendance upon the floor of the House every day until the end of the present session of Congress. This is very important in order to maintain a quorum at all times, and the individual responsibility rests upon each Member. If the Members do not want an extra session, their duty is plain.

THOS. M. BELL, Democratic Whip.

Attest:

JOHN N. GARNER,
J. A. M. ADAIR,
Assistant Whips.

I do not know why they put in "Attest."

Mr. GORDON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. GORDON. Was it because of that notice that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] was not present when a point of no quorum was made?

Mr. MANN. No; it was not because of that. That note was not addressed to me. It was probably because of not receiving the notice the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GORDON] was absent.

Mr. GORDON. I was here.

Mr. MANN. You happened to be here once. But I was not addressing my remarks to the gentleman from Ohio. There are not 70 Members on the Democratic side right now, although there are 290, or near that, of Democratic Members of the House. A pathetic appeal from our beloved Speaker to the Democrats yesterday is forgotten to-day. I want to put the appeal in the RECORD, so that you can read it every morning.

Mr. MURRAY Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MANN. Why, is the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MURRAY] in the Hall? I congratulate him on being present at this time.

Mr. MURRAY. I wanted to suggest that what was the matter with the Members this morning was that they all came in a little bit seasick, and when they arrived here they found the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] talking about a shipwreck bill.

Mr. MANN. I do not wonder it makes the Democrats sick to talk about any kind of a ship bill.

Mr. MURRAY. Does not the gentleman think he ought to make some allowance for this side of the House in view of the fact that the Members have been up two nights and his side has been up only one?

Mr. MANN. I have been up five nights as late as the gentleman has. I hope you will keep a quorum in the House and pay attention to the request of the Speaker.

Mr. GORDON. Will you not help us?

Mr. MANN. I am always here.

Mr. GORDON. Well, keep your colleagues here.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has expired. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] is recognized.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I was very much in hopes that we might agree upon an amendment to this bill, because if we could and remove the chance for fraud that was practiced under the old law we would not have any trouble. And while I am not saying this as representing that any agreement was made, I do believe that if the chairman of the committee, Judge ALEXANDER, were here we could reach an agreement in two minutes. Now, the proposition to which I was addressing myself awhile ago was this, that under the old law admitting these ships to American registry, when they were repaired to the amount of three-fourths of their value, a great many frauds were practiced. And the law was largely repealed because of the fact of these frauds rather than the principle involved in this bill; and it was my understanding, in talking with the distinguished chairman of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, that there would be no objection to amending the bill—that he was anxious to do it, so as to avoid this trouble. Under the old law, and the new law reads exactly the same on that point, I remember one instance, as I cited awhile ago, where watchmen's fees were made a part of the repairs, and where a vessel was refurnished they called the furniture repairs. Now, I do not believe that my friend from Texas wants that kind of a law again written on the statute books. And this law, as it is stated here by the Secretary of Commerce, has been frequently construed. They will go right back again to these old constructions and we will have this same difficulty that we have had before.

Now, I do not think that is a very strong argument that was made by my friend who is in charge of the bill that such amendment will prevent the passage of this bill. I do not think it would. You could reach some agreement with the Senate about it in a few minutes; and I am sure, so far as I am personally concerned, that if you will agree on some amendment of that kind, there will be no attempt made to prevent its passage not only now but when it comes back from the Senate. I am perfectly willing that my friend [Mr. HARDY] shall draw the amendment. I do not care in what particular shape he puts it so long as it will cover this loophole that gave us so much trouble before.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield again?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Washington yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do.

Mr. GOULDEN. The gentleman knows, of course, that he and I served on the Committee on the Merchant Marine for a number of years together—I suppose for the benefit of the country——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. No doubt——

Mr. GOULDEN. And we voted for the repeal of the bill, section 4136; and its repeal was made possible because the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Navigation were anxious to get rid of responsibilities. But does not the gentleman know that the inspection service that we have to-day is much more rigid and efficient than it was in the old days, when we hardly knew what inspection service meant in the various ports of the country?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I think that is true; and I think they would not get through as easily perhaps as they did before. But I ask my friend from New York if he does not remember the time this was considered—if he does not remember that decision of the Attorney General, to the effect that the watchman's fees were to be included as a part of the repair cost?

Mr. GOULDEN. I know; but the watchman's fees do not amount to very much. Twenty-five dollars a month is what a watchman receives on board a ship in addition to his board. It would not be a factor in estimating the cost of repairing the ship. As to the furniture, I think the gentleman will admit that that would be a part of what was destroyed when the ship was wrecked. The furniture is a part of the vessel. The gentleman knows that the furniture does not amount to much, and that this furniture, which was replaced on account of its having been destroyed when the vessel was wrecked, might be considered a proper charge.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If it is anything in relation to the machinery, anything that is necessary to run the vessel, I think that is proper; but even if they wanted to put in the furniture, we ought to make some statement in this bill, some provision, so that it can be understood what repairs may be considered. I recognize, as an attorney, the danger of attempting to be specific, knowing that when you specify certain things you exclude everything else, and that is to be avoided generally. But I do not believe there is any difficulty in this particular case in covering that point, and while watchman's fees amount to very little, as the gentleman has stated, yet the care of the vessel itself amounts to a great deal. You take a vessel and tie it up, and the general cost in taking care of that vessel is enough to enable them soon to come under the terms of this law.

Now this is a proposition to admit these vessels into the coastwise trade. If it were in the foreign trade, I would have no objection to it; none whatever. But if you admit one of these vessels into the coastwise trade, it takes the place of a new vessel that otherwise must be constructed in this country. Every time you put one of these old wrecks into the coastwise trade you not only put it in competition with American vessels that have been constructed in American yards by high-priced American labor, but at the same time it takes the place of a vessel that would necessarily be constructed in one of our yards.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. GORDON. What is the gentleman's objection to having a little competition in this coastwise trade?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I have no objection to competition in the coastwise trade.

Mr. GORDON. Then why does the gentleman object to allowing this?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I do object always, both in the coastwise trade or anywhere else, to the products of foreign cheap labor competing with American labor. [Applause on the Republican side.] I object always to any product produced in another country coming here and competing with the product that is produced by American labor. And that is what I object to here, because if you take one of these vessels that is constructed in one of these foreign shipyards with foreign cheap labor, you not only put it in competition—although that is not the main idea, because if that were all the competition with this vessel is not any greater than with a new one that would be built in our yards—but the proposition is also to prevent a new vessel from being constructed. That is what I object to. If you amend this law by providing that you can not get registry by fraud, I shall not have the objection to the bill I now have, although I think it is bad legislation in principle.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Washington yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Away back in 1879 James G. Blaine, a distinguished Republican, made a speech to the chamber of commerce in New York——

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Is my friend going to repeat the speech that he made? [Laughter.]

Mr. BORLAND. No; I am going to ask the gentleman's views about it. He said that only 23 per cent of American commerce was carried in American bottoms, whereas to-day, after the Republican Party, to which Blaine belonged and to which the gentleman from Washington belongs, has been in power most of the time, I may state that only 8 per cent of American commerce is now carried in American bottoms. And yet the gentleman speaks of new ships being built. When, may I ask, was a new ship built under the policy of the gentleman's party? No new ships have been built, but on the contrary the American merchant marine has gone down steadily under the policy of the gentleman's party, and the gentleman had better own up to it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Well, the gentleman from Washington never denied it, to start with. And that is where he differs sometimes from his friend from Missouri.

Mr. BORLAND. You ought not to deny it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will tell the gentleman, if he wants to know about the shipping bill that has been referred to many times by Republicans. I have stated on the floor of the House many times that my party was not doing what it should do in regard to our merchant marine, but I will tell you what we did do. We did pass a merchant marine bill; we passed it through this House in 1907, and when it went over to the Senate it was filibustered to death by Democratic Senators.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Washington yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. HARDY. That bill was passed through the House after it had been defeated by a narrow margin, and then, when a lot of Members went home, it was called up on a motion to reconsider and passed the House.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Oh, well, the gentleman from Texas ought not to complain of that after the performance that took place yesterday. He ought not to complain about rushing things through the House.

Mr. HARDY. That was done right at the end of the Congress.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. The gentleman does not fully state the facts. The fact was that when the bill went to the Senate a majority was waiting there ready and anxious to pass it, and two Democratic Senators, the late lamented Mr. Carmack, of Tennessee, taking the lead, filibustered against it to the end of the session and caused its defeat.

Mr. HARDY. Now, if the gentleman will yield for just another suggestion. I happened to be here—not yet a Member, but a Member elect—when that measure was brought up in the House in the closing days of the session. It was defeated, and a number of Members, thinking the bill was ended, went home. It was then called up on reconsideration and passed the House by a very narrow margin.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Anyway it passed the House without the assistance of the Democrats.

Mr. HARDY. Under the circumstances which I have stated.

Mr. MANN. I think the impression given by the gentleman from Texas is entirely erroneous. I was one of the Republicans who voted against that bill both times. There was no advantage taken of the fact that Members were absent and had gone home. That was not the question at all. I think there were just as many or more who voted on the last roll call as on the first.

Mr. HARDY. I do not know whether there was any intention to take that kind of an advantage or not.

Mr. MANN. There certainly was not. I was opposed to the bill.

Mr. HARDY. But the gentleman who preceded me in Congress from my district was one of those who thinking that the struggle was ended, got his baggage and went home. Then after that the vote was taken.

Mr. MANN. I think there were more on the second roll call than on the first. Of course he ought to have remained here, but there was no advantage taken at all.

Mr. HARDY. I have no doubt the friends of the subsidy brought all the Members that they could get here.

Mr. MANN. The other side brought all they could get on their side.

Mr. HARDY. And yet some of them went home.

Mr. MANN. You can not keep the Democrats here all the time. They will go home after they have got their money. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDY. You can not keep the Republicans here all the time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield to me about two minutes to state the facts about that?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Certainly; I will yield to the Speaker, even if he is going to roast me.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; I am not going to roast anybody.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I am glad to yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want to state correctly the facts about that transaction, because I took part in it. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] is substantially correct. We beat that ship-subsidy bill that time by 1 majority.

Mr. CLINE. Two majority.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. By 2 majority when the roll was called. It was on the 2d day of March, rather late in the afternoon; and four Democrats, thinking the thing was ended, and being in a great hurry to get home, left the Hall. Then some gentleman moved to reconsider that vote, which he had a perfect right to do, and we did everything that we could to find those four Democrats. We had the boys chasing around here after them, we telegraphed down to the depot, and we called them upon the telephone, but we never could get them back here. One of them was at the depot when they found him, and he said he had bought his ticket and his train was about to start and he was going home.

I immediately sat down and wrote a note to Senator Carmack, telling him that we had lost out by 1 vote on that bill over here, that his term would expire at noon on the 4th of March, and that if he would kill that ship-subsidy bill by talking it to death he would win more fame in the last two days of his service than he had made in the other six years. And not cooperating, but just in a sympathetic state of mind, I suppose, Mr. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS, now a Senator, went over and saw Senator Carmack and told him his time had come, and he acted on the suggestion that both of us made. I am not certain but that he would have thought of it himself, but he proceeded to talk the bill to death. That is the history of it. Nobody was to blame. I do not criticize the man who made the motion to reconsider. The four Democrats who went home perhaps did not know about the rules, and supposed the matter was settled.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I take it that the gentleman believes Senator Carmack did a good thing when he talked that bill to death.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I undoubtedly do think so.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman approves of the policy of talking things to death in the Senate at times?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Of course I approve it if they have a good cause. And while I am at it I will volunteer the opinion that they are not going to have any cloture rule over there soon.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Does the gentleman desire any more time?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. No; I am obliged to my friend for this.

Mr. GOULDEN. I should like to make the statement that in addition to Senator Carmack, Senator NEWLANDS, of Nevada, was his first lieutenant and perhaps did an equal share of the good work. It was my pleasure at that time to have charge of the minority side of the bill, in the absence of Mr. Spight, of Mississippi, who was ill. Those were interesting times.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Senator Carmack started on this scheme of filibustering: He took Webster's Unabridged Dictionary and started in with the first word in it, to talk philology. A man could keep that up, I suppose, for seventeen hundred years.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will my friend from Washington yield me just a moment or two?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. The gentleman knows how the bill was brought out of the committee. I am not going to give away any committee secrets, old that they are, but the gentleman knows it was brought out of the committee in a manner that he himself scarcely approved. A new Member was brought in from the State of New York, and he was sharper and perhaps understood political diplomacy better, and was perhaps less careful about what he did than the older members of the committee, including my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] and my friend from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY], who are the only members of that committee at that time whom I notice on the floor. But, at least, this gentleman from New York had the ship-subsidy bill voted out. A Republican member of the committee unfavorable to subsidy was induced to vote in favor of reporting the bill, although he gave notice that he would speak and vote against it on the floor of the House, which he did, and helped to defeat the measure in the end.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I hope gentlemen on that side will be as liberal with me when I want to ask them questions as I have been with them. I am very glad to have yielded to the Speaker, to get this confession and explanation from him, and to have his stamp of approval upon filibustering when it is done for a good purpose. Of course, it is always in the judgment of the man who is doing the filibustering whether or not it is for a good purpose. And I might add that while the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, Mr. Carmack, may have won some fame, I think there are some Senators who are winning fame just now by their filibustering. [Applause on the Republican side.] They are fighting to keep this country from entering not only upon the path of socialism, not only to save us millions of dollars, but to keep this country in the way of peace and to keep us from entering the shadow of war for the sake of making a few dollars.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. Does not the gentleman think the country would save money if they used the phonograph method instead of having these all-night speeches made by high-priced Senators?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. They might. They might save money by using a rubber stamp and save the trouble of debating at all. We knew as soon as the order was received what the result would be; and I notice with profound regret that my distinguished colleague from Washington got over on the Democratic side and sat around there yesterday, and I wondered whether he was one of the lame ducks that might be seeking some assistance. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRYAN. I will suggest, further, that the gentleman might notice that my vote on the ship proposition was in contrast to that of my distinguished colleague, which, of course, is a matter of great satisfaction to me, and I hope it will be to the people of my district. [Laughter.]

Mr. FALCONER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Yes.

Mr. FALCONER. We have had a very entertaining time between my two colleagues from Seattle. The first part of the session there was a continual quarrel between them, but it so happened about a week ago they were found in the same bed. I recall that a week ago to-night, when the two gentlemen were here and there were some bills on the calendar of interest to them, that first my colleague, Mr. HUMPHREY, said he wished the RECORD to show that he and his colleague, Mr. BRYAN, were here at a late hour looking after the business of the people of the State of Washington; and then, to return the compliment, the gentleman from Washington, Mr. BRYAN, said he hoped that the Record would show that he and the gentleman from Washington, Mr. HUMPHREY, were here looking after the business of the people of Washington—each paying a compliment to the other; and my friend Mr. JOHNSON of Washington and myself were being advertised somewhat.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Advertised as not being here.

Mr. FALCONER. If they had arisen an hour or two before, there would have been other Members from the State of Washington present when bills in which they were interested were up. It is an encouraging thing to see these men get together once in a while.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I am sorry that my other distinguished colleague seems to be somewhat envious of the fact that we took occasion to advertise each other. If he had been here, I would have been glad to put his name in, too, but he was not here; and, by the way, I notice by the roll call that he was not here last night.

Mr. FALCONER. If the gentleman will allow me, it became evident that it would be morning before a vote could be taken, and I did not stay here. But I was as effective as the gentleman who stayed here until 1.25 in the morning. The fact that I did not vote for or against the bill—and I would have voted for it had I been here—was not of much importance, because the result of the vote was known yesterday morning. It was certain of passage and everyone knew it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. After extending this courtesy to the gentleman to square himself with his constituency, notwithstanding our difference in politics, I hope that he will hereafter give me his assistance and support. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman kindly let us know what he is going to run for next time, and we will know whether we can give him our support or not. Of course the gentleman did not ask me.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Unfortunately, I have not been in the habit of consulting my colleagues as to what I will run for.

Mr. MADDEN. It seems to me that the State of Washington is getting too conspicuous on the floor of the House.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is what I wanted to ask the gentleman, if he did not think that in this Congress the membership from the State of Washington had taken more than its share of the time in airing its troubles.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. If that is the gentleman's view of it he ought not to have added to the hilarity of the occasion. [Laughter.]

Mr. TAGGART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. TAGGART. Is not there something wrong with the Directory of Congress as to the State of Washington? I had an impression until recently that you gentlemen all belonged to one party.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That is an impression that nobody in the State of Washington ever had. [Laughter.] Mr. Speaker, I will now get back to talk about the bill, if my colleagues have occupied as much time as they wish. This bill is another step in regard to the upbuilding of the merchant marine along the line advocated by my Democratic friends. It is a proposition, of course, to admit foreign-built ships to the coastwise trade.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for an outside matter not connected with the bill?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I will.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask that Judge ALEXANDER be excused for the day on account of sickness. He is sick, and has asked me to prefer that request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. ALEXANDER, be excused for the day on account of sickness. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

REGISTER OF FOREIGN-BUILT SHIPS.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, my good friend from Ohio, Mr. GORDON, refers back to the matter of which we heard so much yesterday, namely, the Shipping Trust. Of course, there was a great deal of talk yesterday on each side of the aisle in regard to a shipping trust. As a matter of fact, most of it was talk merely for the gallery. The Shipping Trust, so far as one has ever existed, has been formed of foreign ships, and it seems to me that you gentlemen on that side of the aisle are estopped from accusing anyone of being a friend of the Shipping Trust in view of the action recently taken by your party. One gentleman after another yesterday accused me of representing the Shipping Trust. I do not care how much they accuse me of that, as it does not make any difference to me. As a matter of fact, as all of the older Members of this House know, I stood upon the floor of this House time after time denouncing the Shipping Trust and trying to get it investigated long before any gentleman on that side ever had a word to say about it. I was the one who first introduced the resolution; I was the one who urged this investigation. But the other day you passed a law permitting foreign-built ships to American registry, and the United Fruit Co. and the United States Steel Co. and the Standard Oil Co. were the ones that took advantage of it, and it is known of all men that at the request of those great combinations and trusts the President of the United States issued an order that they might keep foreign officers upon them. While you were doing that and while your President was issuing that order I was sending in protests that are now on file in the White House protesting against that procedure. If I am a friend of the Shipping Trust, in what attitude is the President of the United States? No one ever heard me utter a word in defense of the foreign shipping combine. I introduced a bill and it passed this House, but died in the Senate, not by the action of a Democrat, but by the action of a Republican Senator, let it be said in order that the truth may be known, that would have successfully reached these trusts. It provided that any vessel that was found to be in one of these combinations could be excluded from our ports, the only effective remedy, so far as I know, that has ever been proposed in Congress, and the one that caused more disturbance and uneasiness among these foreign trusts than anything else.

Mr. Speaker, I had hoped that my friend from Texas [Mr. HARDY] might agree to some amendment, but as he will not, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is not.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. On this call 275 Members have answered to their names—a quorum.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I desire to address the House briefly in reference to the pending bill.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. I yield.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, it was my privilege to serve on the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, beginning with the Fifty-eighth Congress, for eight years. Among my earlier efforts in this House I introduced a bill to give American charters to two different steamers, the Marie and the Success, of New York, and after three years of untiring work I succeeded in having the act passed. The estimated salving value of the vessels was about $20,000 each, and yet there was expended on them $96,000 in one case in an American shipyard and $82,000 on the other; in other words, nearly five times as much as the salving value of the vessels. Those two vessels had a tonnage, in round figures, of 12,000 tons. In 63 years, according to the report of the Commissioner of Navigation, we have succeeded in having steamers that have been wrecked admitted to the extent of only 52,836 tons, out of which must be deducted 12,000 tons, representing the steamers that I have just referred to. In 1906 I voted to repeal this enactment. It was a mistake. With my years of experience since then I would not do it again. Therefore I am in favor of the passage of the bill now before us. At that time the Inspection Service was loose, and the Commissioner of Navigation and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor were anxious to unload the burden and get rid of its responsibilities, and hence under the pressure from these two departments as well as the desire to help them out we voted to repeal the bill. I want to admit publicly now that it was one of the mistakes that I made in my 10 years of service here, and therefore I hope that this bill will be enacted into law and will receive the approval of this House. It is in the interest of good administration and will tend to add to the merchant marine so badly needed in this Nation of ours.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman, and I hope the membership will take advantage of the experience of the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN].

I desire to say to the Democratic membership here that, in view of the partisan and Shipping Trust opposition which this bill has met, I desire them to stay until the conclusion of my remarks, which will be very brief, and we will endeavor to do business. When a similar bill to this passed the Senate in the Sixty-second Congress, and it came to this House, it was referred to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries. At that time it was given extensive hearings. Representatives of those engaged in the wrecking business, labor representatives, and some other representatives in the building and construction of vessels appeared before our committee. We heard the evidence in full and investigated it carefully at that time and made a report to this House recommending its passage. It failed of passage, however, in that Congress, due to the fact that it was not reached in its turn upon the calendar. Now, this bill comes from the Senate under similar circumstances. The committee that had it under consideration in the Senate made a very full and complete report, and that is one of the reasons why the House report on this bill is so brief. I hold in my hand a copy of the Senate committee report, which had the same under consideration, and it contains some information which I think may be of interest and profit to the membership here in voting upon this question. It appears that the law we propose to place upon the statute books by this bill has heretofore been upon the statute books of the United States for over 54 years. It was first adopted December 23, 1852, and in this language, which is practically the same as contained in the pending bill:

SEC. 4136. The Secretary of the Treasury may issue a register or enrollment for any vessel built in a foreign country, whenever such vessel shall be wrecked in the United States and shall be purchased and repaired by a citizen of the United States, if it shall be proved to the satisfaction of the Secretary that the repairs put upon such vessel are equal to three-fourths of the cost of the vessel so repaired.

This is the identical language contained in the present bill, and the present bill, in addition, contains some provision for guarding against the securing of registration by fraudulent means. This remained the law until 1906, when Congress passed an act repealing the same. At that time, in 1906, when the repeal bill was before Congress, Mr. Metcalf, at the request of some one, sent to the committee a letter which Mr. GREENE read to us a short time ago. The Senate report says in connection with the letter—the letter is set forth in full in the Senate report:

The burden of the objection to section 4136—

That is the old law—

made by the Commissioner of Navigation, above referred to, was that his bureau had a limited clerical force incapable of giving the proper investigation to the important subject involved, and that the committees of Congress could examine more thoroughly into each case as it presented itself. There can be no doubt that the Congress at the time of the repeal of the above section (Apr. 11, 1906) did not intend a departure from the thoroughly established policy of the Government and our people to admit ships which are three-fourths American to registry and enrollment (and which had worked well for 54 years, as shown by the record of the tonnage admitted) but only to change the tribunal from Commissioner of Navigation to the Congress itself. This is clearly shown by the debates in the Fifty-ninth Congress, first session (see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, pp. 2610–2615, inclusive), some portions of which are hereto appended.

And I want to call attention to the fact that the report met considerable opposition here as shown by the debate, a few sentences of which I will take the privilege of reading at this time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Do I understand that if we pass this bill, for a wrecked ship to get American registry it has to come to Congress? I do not understand that it does now. I understand that the Department of Commerce and Labor, if three-fourths of the ship is new and built in America, can give it American registry.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And it simply proposes on their own recommendation that that power be taken from them, but all the other rights and privileges are retained in the law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But there will be no rights and privileges left?

Mr. GROSVENOR. They are all left except that one privilege.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is the privilege of American registry?

Mr. GROSVENOR. No; I have stated that there are four ways that a ship can get American registry, and this takes away only one of them and leaves all the others exactly as they are now.

It appears there was a very lengthy debate on it, which is shown quite at length in the Senate committee report. Now, they state further:

The bill S. 2335 proposes to reenact the old section 4136 as it existed for some 54 years with certain additions which will more completely safeguard its provisions.

Under its provisions to entitle a foreignbuilt vessel to United States register or enrollment, such vessel must be: First, wrecked on the coasts of the United States or her possessions or adjacent waters; second, she must be purchased by a citizen or citizens of the United States; third, she must be repaired in a shipyard in the United States or her possessions; fourth, the repairs put upon such a vessel must be equal to three times the appraisal salved value of the vessel; fifth, the expense of the appraisal shall be borne by the owner of the vessel; sixth, if any of the representations made to obtain the register are not true, the vessel, her tackle, apparel, and furniture shall be forfeited to the United States.

Right in that connection I desire to say I, for one, can not understand when this law was upon the statute books previously how there could be included as part of the repairs the expense of paying a watchman for taking care of the vessel. If so, certainly during the previous existence of this law there was something rotten in Denmark. I do not think you will find any such construction placed upon this law by any Democratic administration.

Under its provisions to entitle a foreign-built vessel to United States registry except by a special act of Congress. It is manifestly absurd to require that in case a foreign vessel is wrecked on our coasts and is salved by American tugs, refusing to pay the salvage, is libelled and sold by decree of court, and is purchased by the salvors to protect themselves, it can not be given American registry and put to use until the salvors shall have a bill introduced in Congress, appear in Washington and make proof of all their allegations, have the bill favorably reported by committees, passed by both Houses of Congress, and approved by the President. The well-known delays, expense, and trouble of such a performance make it practically prohibitory and works a hardship on the people who have saved the wreck, often the people who have repaired the wreck, and benefits no one.

It is for this reason we desire to have the old law restored as proposed by this bill.

Now, then, gentlemen, I think that under the circumstances we all have a pretty fair knowledge of the meaning and purposes of this bill. As we have spent already two hours and a half upon it, I take the privilege at this time, Mr. Speaker, of moving the previous question upon the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read a third time.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the final passage of the bill, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] raises the point of no quorum. Evidently there is none.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] moves a call of the House.

Mr. HARDY. And I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. That is not in order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. ANDERSON. This is an automatic roll call.

The SPEAKER. It is not an automatic roll call. There was no division going on at the time. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] moves a call of the House.

Mr. HARDY. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HARDY. On that call of the House is there a vote on the passage of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. HARDY. As a novice in parliamentary practice, the bill being on its passage, and the vote being ready when the point of no quorum is made, I wish to know if automatically the vote under the point of no quorum does not come up on the passage of the bill?

Mr. BRYAN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BRYAN. The Speaker has stated that the ayes had the motion.

The SPEAKER. That was on the third reading of the bill. The vote is simply to see whether there is a quorum present.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. NORTON. To make a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker. The Speaker had just declared that the question of the third reading of the bill had carried when the point of no quorum was raised.

The SPEAKER. That is the situation. That is exactly what the Chair said.

Mr. HARDY. Has the Speaker yet decided whether a quorum is present or not?

The SPEAKER. No; that is the very thing we are trying to do.

Mr. MANN. The Chair said that evidently there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair said that there was no quorum present. At the time the point was raised there were not over 40 men on the floor.

Mr. GARNER. The House has already ordered a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Two hundred and seventy Members being present, there is a quorum.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] moves that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, is it in order now to offer an amendment to the bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No.

Mr. HARDY. I understand the question now is on the passage of the bill; the vote is upon that, and on that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas moves the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. HARDY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MOORE. Did not the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY], in making his request, ask for the yeas and nays on this question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No, sir; the Chair understands he did not.

Mr. HARDY. That question was not entertained by the Speaker, and not insisted upon by me.

Mr. MOORE. I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GREENE] intended to make it, and I understood the gentleman from Texas did make it. I am not in charge of the bill, but I understood the demand was to be made.

Mr. HARDY. That might have been; but the question was taken without objection, and the declaration of the result was had without objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that if such a determination on the part of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] was expressed it was before the present Presiding Officer was in the chair.

A MEMBER. Oh, no!

Mr. MOORE. Some of those who desired to oppose this bill had no opportunity to be heard, and I am one of them.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Regular order!

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I make the demand for the yeas and nays.

Mr. RAGSDALE. A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAGSDALE. It has already been considered and laid on the table. The point of order is that it comes too late now.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The yeas and nays were not ordered. The gentleman knows that they must be ordered before they can be had.

Mr. MOORE. I understood the gentleman from Texas called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. They had to be ordered.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays were never ordered.

PARKWAY THROUGH FISH STATION, JEFFERSON COUNTY, KY.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania makes a demand after the motion to lay on the table had been made and agreed to. Now, I wish to call up from the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries the bill H. R. 14950.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. MOORE rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Pennsylvania rise?

Mr. MOORE. To request unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bill just passed—the shipping bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the bill just passed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUCHANAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the question of the Federal liability laws.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the Federal liability laws. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAGSDALE rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from South Carolina rise?

Mr. RAGSDALE. I rise to ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on the child-labor bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks on the child-labor bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PARKWAY THROUGH FISH STATION, JEFFERSON COUNTY, KY.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill. What is the number?

Mr. HARDY. No. 14950.

The SPEAKER. Senate or House?

Mr. HARDY. It is a House bill to authorize the city of Louisville, Ky., to open a parkway through the United States fish station and hatchery in Jefferson County, Ky.

Mr. MANN. Numbered 203 on the Union Calendar.

Mr. HARDY. This is a bill, Mr. Speaker, about which I do not think there will be any difference, and I would like to ask that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. We have not arrived at that point yet. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14950) to authorize the city of Louisville, Ky., to open a parkway through the United States fish station and hatchery in Jefferson County, Ky.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects, and the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] in the chair.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, pending the going into the Committee of the Whole, I would like to know if we can agree upon a limit of time for debate.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call attention to the fact that upon an appropriation bill a provision substantially like that embodied in this bill was carried and is now a law.

Mr. HARDY. That being the case, Mr. Speaker, I wish to withdraw the proposition presented in this bill. I have been trying to find Mr. SHERLEY.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] withdraws the bill. Has the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries any other bill?

SURVEY OF OYSTER BEDS, COAST OF TEXAS.

Mr. HARDY. Yes; Senate bill 3362, on the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (S. 3362) to authorize the Secretary of Commerce, through the Coast and Geodetic Survey and the Bureau of Fisheries, to make a survey of natural oyster beds, bars, and rocks, and barren bottoms contiguous thereto in waters along the coast of and within the State of Texas,

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar. The House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union——

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. HARDY. Can not we agree on a limit of time for the discussion of the bill before going into Committee of the Whole?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, what other bill does the gentleman from Texas expect to call up to-day?

Mr. HARDY. There is an omnibus fish-hatchery bill, but we have concluded not to press that bill or insist upon it.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, I felt constrained yesterday to object to the extension of remarks in the RECORD on the shipping bill. I thought that possibly we would go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to-day, and if gentlemen now want to discuss that bill or ask leave to extend remarks in the RECORD upon it under the proceedings of to-day, I would have no objection. I think we can probably use the day on this bill and before we adjourn very likely pass it. So I do not think it is desirable to limit debate now.

Mr. FOSTER. Is it the idea of the gentleman from Illinois that he would be willing for those who desire to extend remarks on the shipping bill generally to have that opportunity?

Mr. MANN. I would have no objection under the provisions in this bill, not to go into the proceedings of yesterday.

Mr. FOSTER. Suppose a Member wants to extend his remarks on the shipping bill?

Mr. MANN. We will see if they can not all be accommodated in Committee of the Whole to-day.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the objection to doing it now?

Mr. MANN. I shall have to object if it is asked right now.

Mr. FOSTER. That will only give a few who may be here the opportunity.

Mr. MANN. We will see if we can not accommodate everybody who wants to get in.

The House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. UNDERWOOD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

S. 3362, an act to authorize the Secretary of Commerce, through the Coast and Geodetic Survey and the Bureau of Fisheries, to make a survey of natural oyster beds, bars and rocks, and barren bottoms contiguous thereto in waters along the coast of and within the State of Texas.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Commerce be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, upon the request of the governor of the State of Texas, to assign such officers, experts, and employees of the Coast and Geodetic Survey and of the Bureau of Fisheries as may be necessary to make a survey of natural oyster beds, bars and rocks, and barren bottoms contiguous thereto in waters along the coast of and within the State of Texas, including the compilation of the results of said survey for publication, and for this purpose he is authorized to employ in the District of Columbia and elsewhere such technically qualified persons as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act.

SEC. 2. That the Coast and Geodetic Survey and the Bureau of Fisheries be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to expend, under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce, a sum of money hereafter authorized to be appropriated not exceeding $10,000 in carrying out the purposes of this act, which amount is to be available until used.

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect from the date of its passage.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, before I begin to explain the bill or refer to it I want to ask a parliamentary question. As I understand, I will be recognized for an hour, and I can yield a portion of my time without losing the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is being considered under general debate. The gentleman is recognized for one hour, and he can yield such time as he sees fit.

Mr. HARDY. Then, Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH] five minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, the spectacle which we witnessed in this Chamber yesterday would in no way tend to convince the people of this country that the House of Representatives is a necessary branch of our legislative body, and this is especially true since the scene enacted is only a repetition in an aggravated form of what has been happening ever since April, 1913. King Caucus and gag rule have become the principal methods of legislation. There is no doubt but that party conferences are necessary now and then for the sake of the party, but when it is carried to the extent that it has been in this Congress and those conferences reach a point where a small minority of a legislative body force legislation upon the majority, it becomes exceedingly dangerous. This House was told that it must pass a measure of great importance on a certain day, on a certain hour, without the right to amend it or to discuss it for more than six hours.

Is it surprising that the ranking member of the Committee on Merchant Marine had to spend most of his time manipulating the lists of those who opposed the bill so as to take care of a few of his special friends? Of course, the distinguished gentleman criticized most severely the members of the majority for bringing in this gag rule, but he had no sooner taken his seat than he himself commenced to discriminate among the members of the minority. However, the gentleman has been breathing this unnatural legislative atmosphere so long that he should be pardoned for imitating the methods of the Democratic Party, but even this does not alleviate the unfairness of the tactics employed. There is nothing about this legislation which called upon the Democratic Party to substitute force for reason, but much that demands our best thought and sound judgment, hence full discussion and debate. The American people, irrespective of parties, recognize the necessity of building up a merchant marine and are demanding legislation that will bring that about. But this bill is not only a makeshift, but also exceedingly dangerous.

However, it is claimed that it is an emergency measure. If that is its purpose it must get into the shipping business at once, and the only way that that can be done is to purchase German interned ships, since they are the only ships for sale. No one is so dense as not to recognize the danger at this time of purchasing ships from the citizens of any belligerent nation, and to avoid this contention the sponsors for the bill claim that they may build ships. They are not very emphatic in making this claim, because they know that if they were no one would put any faith in their statement that this is an emergency measure. However, they are perfectly willing to let it be understood that if we will only trust to the wisdom of the shipping board that they will see to it, no matter what course they pursue, that we do not become involved with any foreign country by reason of any acts of theirs, and are also perfectly willing to have it understood that they may go into the shipbuilding business. If the purpose of this legislation is to authorize the Government to build its own ships, why resort to such subterfuge as having a shipping board flanked by a corporation? Why could not the Secretary of Commerce and the Secretary of the Navy be instructed to proceed at once to provide for the erection of ships both by private shipyards and at the navy yards? Such a course would be the straightforward way of doing business and would not excite any suspicion. Any attempt to complicate a law by loading it down with a great many provisions and conditions which are shrouded in a great deal of mystery gives just ground for suspicion, and it is putting it mildly to say that this Congress has every reason to be suspicious, not of the motives of the parties who brought this legislation before us, but of the effects of the legislation.

The provisions of the bill themselves furnish almost positive proof that the intent of the legislation is to create a condition which will deceive foreign countries as to the real ownership and responsibility of Government ships. Furthermore, this is a plain attempt to substitute a shipping board for Congress. The bill proposes to set aside all existing shipping rules and regulations and to permit the board to substitute others in their place. [Applause.]

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PAGE].

[Mr. PAGE of North Carolina addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized, for I want to yield some time on this side of the House.

Mr. HARDY. I understand that anybody who is recognized has an hour, but there are some Members on this side who want to speak first. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the shipping bill.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I have no objection to the gentleman extending his remarks on the shipping bill or anything else, so that it comes under the consideration of this bill.

Mr. MCKELLAR. What does the gentleman mean by that?

Mr. MANN. I mean that it is to be inserted in the proceedings of to-day and not in yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. HARDY. Oh, no; it will be under the proceedings of to-day.

Mr. MANN. Then I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, on the bill under consideration I wish to make a very brief statement and express the hope that, so far as this bill is concerned, when we shall have consumed as much time as we can conveniently to-day there will be no opposition to the bill. I am informed that on the coast adjacent to Texas there are quite extensive oyster beds and quite a necessity for a geodetic survey, and that these oyster beds have been to a large extent exhausted and that a food proposition is involved largely in the question of the Government taking charge for the purpose of establishing or locating an oyster bed or fish hatchery, or something along that line. This is a preliminary matter designed to give the Government information in connection with it and to better qualify the authorities to take the proper steps. It only provides for a preliminary survey in the barren bottoms, oyster beds, bars, and rocks along the coast of and within the State of Texas, and provides for the expenditure by the Coast and Geodetic Survey and the Bureau of Fisheries, under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce, of the sum of money hereinafter to be appropriated, not to exceed $10,000, and, of course, until that sum is appropriated nothing can be done under the bill. It is practically only to clothe the proper authorities with the right to make the survey.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HARDY. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. My recollection is—the gentleman will know whether I am correct or not—that a similar authority was given to the Secretary of Commerce with reference to the oyster beds of Maryland some years ago.

Mr. HARDY. I think so.

Mr. MANN. And the survey has been made or is being made, I do not know which. This is to make a survey of beds which can be used for the propagation of oysters in the Gulf along the Texas coast.

Mr. HARDY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I take it that the intention is to authorize an appropriation of $10,000,000 or some lessor sum for this purpose, but as I read section 2 that would not be accomplished. Perhaps I am wrong. Section 2 provides—

> That the Coast and Geodetic Survey and the Bureau of Fisheries be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to expend, under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce, a sum of money hereafter authorized to be appropriated not exceeding $10,000 in carrying out the purposes of this act, which amount is to be available until used.

This apparently provides for a sum of money to be hereafter authorized to be appropriated. Of course that would not give authority for the appropriation without further authorization.

Mr. HARDY. Does the gentleman suggest an amendment?

Mr. MANN. I was going to suggest striking out section 2 entirely and inserting in section 1, in line 1, on page 2, after the word "publication," the language "at a total limit of cost of $10,000."

That would be an authorization.

Mr. HARDY. Would it not be still better to say "at a cost not exceeding $10,000"?

Mr. MANN. That is the same thing—a limit of cost. That does not mean that we have to make the appropriation. Wherever we authorize anything of this sort we usually put in a limit of cost. We authorize the thing to be done and fix a limit of cost. Now, the appropriation might be only $2,000, or whatever they need.

Mr. HARDY. I recognize that the language suggested by the gentleman from Illinois would be better than the language in the bill, but we are so near the close of this session that there may be difficulty in getting the amendment concurred in by the Senate.

Mr. MANN. I do not think there will be any trouble about the Senate agreeing to these House amendments to Senate bills. There has been no difficulty about that.

Mr. HARDY. Then I will accept the suggestion of the gentleman to strike out section 2.

Mr. MANN. When we get to reading the bill under the five-minute rule. I do not think this is an authorization as it now reads, and I doubt whether the passage of the bill would have any effect if a point of order should be made on an appropriation; and I think if we are going to do it, there is no use in making two bites of a cherry.

Mr. HARDY. I will at the proper time accept the amendment suggested by the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, this Congress will soon expire by limitation of law. It may be that as a young man serving my first term I am more deeply impressed with the work we have done than are those of longer service, but be that as it may, I venture the assertion that this Congress has enacted more constructive legislation than any Congress that has convened in half a century. It is a source of gratification to me that the Congress in which I am serving my first term has such a splendid record of achievement, and yet, Mr. Chairman, in spite of the pride I feel for the things we have done, I deeply regret that we have not legislated upon another subject that to my mind is of equal, if not greater, importance than either the tariff, currency, trust regulation, or Trade Commission, and that is the pressing need for a rural or farm credit system. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I shall not undertake at this time to discuss in detail the question of farm credits, but I shall confine myself to a brief consideration of what is meant by the term "rural credits," a statement of some of the necessities for such legislation, and meet some of the objections that are made by those who oppose it.

The term "rural credits" is generally used to designate any system of financial machinery whereby funds are furnished to meet the peculiar and special needs of the farmers upon such terms and at such a rate of interest as not to prove burdensome. Farm credit is divided into two classes, long-term or land credit, which is briefly defined as "credit to meet the capital requirements of the farmer," and short-term or personal credit, which is briefly defined as "credit to meet the current or annually recurring needs of the farmer." The establishment of some system of long-term or land credit for the farmer is the object of most of the bills pending on this subject, and I shall confine what I have to say to that branch of the subject, and by using the term "farm credits," or "rural credits," I shall mean simply land credits for farmers, whereby they procure long-time loans, secured by mortgages on their land, drawing a low rate of interest, the loan to be repaid by the payment of not only the interest each year but a small part of the principal, an amount so small that it will not be a serious burden to him and yet so large that in a given term of years the entire debt is paid and his mortgage canceled. This plan of loans, which is known as the amortization plan, has been tested in nearly every civilized country in the world, and proved a success. By such a plan the farmer avoids the anxiety caused by the fear that when his debt comes due he will not be able to either pay it or renew it, but will be forced to lose his home by foreclosure. Under the amortization plan of loans, which has proved a success in other countries, the farmer pays no more each year than the average American farmer now pays in interest.

For illustration, let us take one of the German land-credit plans to which attention has been called by Senator FLETCHER, who was a member of the Rural Credit Commission that visited Europe a few years ago. The rates of interest generally in Germany are higher than they are in this country, yet under a farm-credit system in Germany on a loan to a German farmer made at 4 per cent interest there is added three-fourths of 1 per cent for amortization, one-fourth of 1 per cent to cover operating expenses of the system, or a total of 5 per cent annually; and by paying this amount each year for a given number of years the entire debt was paid and his mortgage canceled. The American farmer pays 8 or 10 per cent interest per annum on the mortgage on his farm. The loan of the German farmer is in fact an investment. He can afford to borrow money to buy a farm or improve a farm at that rate. The American farmer is in debt; the German farmer is using his credit. Each year while paying 5 per cent on the money received the German farmer is getting out of debt, while the American farmer is paying 10 per cent and not reducing his debt a penny.

But it is urged by those who oppose farm-credit legislation in this country that conditions are different here to those in Europe, and that a system of land credits applicable to European conditions under European forms of government is not applicable to conditions in the United States and can not be provided under our form of government. Of course both conditions and forms of government are different here to those in Europe, and I do not propose that we adopt for this country any system now used in Europe, but I deny that under this great democratic Government, republican in form, founded primarily, as declared in the preamble to our Constitution, "to promote the general welfare," we are without power to provide the American farmer with such financial facilities as are necessary to meet the special needs of his economic conditions. [Applause.]

The contention that under our Constitution this Government is powerless to meet this grave problem and solve it is a sad commentary upon our form of government. The solution of this problem has not been beyond the powers of the Republic of France, the Kingdoms of Great Britain and Italy, the Empires of Austria and Germany, and the Autocracy of Russia, and yet those who oppose farm-credit legislation say that it is beyond the constitutional power of this a democratic Government. I repeat, if this contention be true, then what a sad commentary upon our boasted republican form of government. Those who make this contention find themselves in the ludicrous position of saying that we have constitutional power to give direct aid to the farmer by furnishing him free seeds, but not the power to directly aid him in procuring the land in which to plant them; the power to supply funds for agents to teach him how to till the soil, but no power to aid him by furnishing him with financial facilities by which he will be assisted in buying the soil; the power to grant millions of acres of the public domain to the railroads of this country; the power to spend hundreds of millions to aid the commerce of the world by building the Panama Canal; the power to pour unnumbered millions into the development of Alaska for the building of railroads; the power to spend millions for the building of Government ships, as we propose in the ship-purchase bill; but no power to provide the farmers of this country with a separate financial system adapted to their economic needs. Oh, if this be true, then what a peculiar instrument is this our Constitution! [Applause.]

Those who hold this view do not question the constitutional authority to loan to the banks of this country millions out of the Treasury at 2 per cent, yet rush to the defense of the Constitution when it is proposed to furnish to the farm builders such credit facilities as the great economic need of the Nation demands. The only constitutional objection that some gentlemen have ever offered to loaning money to the banks has not been to the loan of the money, but to the requirement that the banks should pay interest on these loans. Oh, but they indignantly cry out that the Government does not "loan" its money to the banks, but just "deposits" it. Well, why not provide the American farmer with proper agencies adapted to furnishing him needed credit facilities and "deposit" with these agencies some of this money? [Applause.]

To say it is possible under European forms of government for them to provide, as they have, separate systems of financing the special needs of their farmers, and that it is impossible under our form of government to safely provide a separate system of financing the needs of the American farmer applicable to his conditions, is a severe indictment of our system of government. Those who thus indict and condemn our form of government are either ignorant of the spirit and character of our system of government or else they are ignorant of and indifferent to the needs of agriculture in this country and have no conception of the fact that the prosperity and security of this country depend upon the prosperity of the producing classes.

The first great economic duty of a nation is to feed and clothe itself, and any form of government is inherently weak and defective if under its limitations its legislative department can not by providing proper credit facilities procure capital funds on reasonable terms for its producers and thereby enable and assist them by their labor and by their own initiative perform this great duty.

I deny that our form of government makes it impossible to discharge this great duty. I believe the American Congress has ample authority to provide an American system of rural credits, American in form, American in spirit, and so framed as to meet American economic conditions and afford proper credit facilities in an American way to meet the needs of the American farmer. I shall not at this time discuss any particular plan. Some two years ago I outlined a plan, which I think safe, sound, and practical and in keeping not only with the customs and practices of this country but certain to provide ample funds for the American farmer at a reasonable rate of interest and upon long terms without disturbing the system of commercial credits and commercial banking now existing. But, Mr. Speaker, I repeat that I shall not undertake to discuss any particular plan, because my prime purpose upon this occasion is not to impress upon you the merits of any pet plan of my own, but to urge the necessity for some plan and meet the objections that have been offered to every plan. I have no particular pride of opinion, and will not refuse to take any plan because I can not get my own, but if this Congress recognizes the necessity for and the wisdom of enacting rural-credit legislation, I feel sure that we shall be able to agree upon a plan by making mutual concessions as to details, so I shall not stop at this time or be diverted from a discussion of the main question by engaging in a dispute as to the relative merits of the different plans proposed, but shall resume consideration of the objections that are offered to this class of legislation.

The principal opposition to rural-credit legislation is placed upon the ground that there is no necessity for any such legislation. We are told by those who oppose this legislation that the American farmer is sturdy, independent, self-reliant, and prosperous, and through present banking facilities his needs are being fully met, and, in fact, some contend that he is more prosperous than other classes. I heard one of these distinguished gentlemen, in discussing his opposition to farm-credits legislation, state that he did not see why there was any demand for this legislation, as the farmers in his part of the country could get all the money they wanted for 5 and 6 per cent, and that, as a matter of fact, most of the farmers in his territory own the banks and have money loaned out at interest. Another gentleman has called attention to the fact that last summer he addressed a large gathering of farmers in his district, and that hundreds of automobiles were parked around the meeting place, which automobiles were owned by the prosperous farmers, and in which they rode to and from the meeting. It may be true that in some parts of the country the farmers as a class are exceedingly prosperous, that they are wealthy, that they follow the plows during the week days and ride in expensive automobiles on Sunday. It may be they have a great deal of surplus money saved up, that they own the banks of their communities, and that out of their surplus funds make individual loans to relieve the distress of the merchants, the lawyers, the doctors, and the manufacturers in their sections. I say, Mr. Speaker, this may be true, because reputable men have stated that these conditions are true in their communities, but I deny that such is the condition of the farming classes of the country as a whole. Let us for a moment consider the facts as to agriculture in this country. In 1880, according to the Federal census, over 70 per cent of the population of the United States was classified as agricultural. In 1910 the Federal census shows only 53 per cent of the population so classified. A close analysis of these statistics will show that these figures are misleading, for the facts are in many parts of the country farm lands have been abandoned, until now only 28 per cent live on the farm, and each year sees a greater number of young men of the agricultural classes leaving the farms and going to the towns and cities, and, in addition, the number of farm home owners of this country is becoming fewer and fewer, and the number of the tenant class is very rapidly on the increase. So heavy has become the burden upon the farming classes, staggering under the heavy load they have to bear, forced to finance their operations by an expensive commercial financial system, that the tendency is away from home owning and toward absentee landlordism. I recently heard a great agricultural expert of this House, who has given a great deal of thought and investigation to the changing conditions of farm life, in analyzing the statistics presented by the last Federal census, state that if the present drift were not checked and conditions were not relieved, in less than 50 years' time 20 per cent of the people of this country would be called upon to feed and clothe the remaining 80 per cent.

This is the only civilized nation upon the face of the earth that has not recognized and acted upon the necessity of a separate system of financing for its agricultural classes. By providing a separate system of financing for the farmers of this country we will not accord to them a special privilege, which is charged by some of those who are vehement in their opposition to this legislation. We have provided a system of financing for the commercial interests of this country, the prime object of that financial system being, as stated over and over by its proponents, to furnish credit facilities that would meet the "expanding and contracting needs of commerce." If that be true, that our present financial system is shaped entirely to meet the short-term credit demands of commerce, then if we provide facilities which will supply the long-term credit demands of the American farmer, we will not be granting to him a special privilege, but we shall only be doing him equal justice and according to him equal facilities.

Mr. Chairman, the man who says that the present commercial banking system of this country can carry the load of American agriculture and safely furnish the capital requirements of the American farmer upon terms that will not be a burden is either ignorant of the very law that underlies a commercial bank and necessarily controls its operation, or else he is ignorant of the economic needs of the agricultural classes. The very law of the being of a commercial bank is to furnish short-term credits to facilitate and furnish a medium of exchange for the daily transactions of the commercial world. The law of necessity requires the commercial bank to keep its assets liquid, so that it can at all times be ready to meet the demand obligations of its depositors and furnish the bulk of its capital. It would be unwise and it would be unsafe for a commercial bank to fly in the face of this necessity and jeopardize the safety of its institution by loaning out its deposits upon long-term credits. Assuming that the commercial bankers are doing the best they can for agriculture, yet the law of their being and the necessities of the commercial world make it impossible for them to meet to the fullest extent the necessary demands of agriculture. Fortunately, a great many of the bankers of the agricultural States recognize this fact and are strong advocates of rural-credit legislation. One of these country bankers, in discussing this proposed legislation, stated that while it would primarily be of greatest benefit to the farmers, it would also benefit the country banks, for the reason that by a proper rural-credit system low-rate investment funds from the North and East would be brought into the agricultural communities of the South and West by these long-term loans to farmers, and these funds thus brought in would swell the current funds of the community, increase the amount of circulation per capita in these communities, and enable the country bankers in the agricultural towns to more readily meet the needs of commercial operations in these communities, and make it easier for the country banker to meet the short-term annual demands of the farmer upon easier terms. There is no question but that this country banker has the right view. There is no question but that all classes in the parts of the country where agricultural lands are being developed and farm homes are being built would profit greatly by this influx of low-rate long-term investment money. This country banker stated that the proper function of a commercial bank is to gather up the scattered cash in its community and convert this cash into banking credit, selling the same to its borrowers, while the capital demands of the farmers are just the reverse, in that they need to gather up the scattered credits made up of the loans of the farmers and convert these scattered credits into cash.

Those who say there is no necessity for this class of legislation and that the present Federal reserve act furnishes ample credit facilities for the farmer are few in number. President Wilson recognizes the necessity and the inadequacy of the present system, which he clearly set forth in a statement which appeared in the newspapers on August 13, 1913. In this statement he said that the proposal to include in the then pending Federal reserve act provisions for the facilitation of such credits as the farmers in the country most stand in need of—that is, agricultural credits as distinguished from ordinary commercial and industrial credits—were not adopted because such credits could only be imperfectly provided for in such measure. In addition, he further stated in the same newspaper statement that—

> The scope and character of the bill, its immediate and chief purpose, could not be made to reach as far as the special interests of the farmer require. Special machinery and a distinct system of banking must be provided for if rural credits are to be successfully and adequately supplied.

President Wilson in this same statement, in discussing the necessities for rural-credit legislation and pointing out the serious disadvantages under which the American farmer is laboring, said:

> One of the chief and most serious of these disadvantages has been that he has not been able to secure the extended bank accommodations he every year stands in need of without paying the most burdensome rates of interest and saddling himself with mortgages and obligations of every kind, which he fairly staggered under, if he could carry them at all. In other countries systems of rural credit have been put into operation which have not only relieved the farmer, but have put his enterprises upon a footing of easy accomplishment. Countries in which agriculture was fatally languishing, because wholly unprofitable, have seen their farming lands blossom again and their people turn once more hopefully to the soil for a living. Our farmers must have similar means afforded them of handling their financial needs, easily and inexpensively. They should be furnished these facilities before their enterprises languish, not afterwards. And they will be. This is our next great task and duty.

Another objection that is urged against rural-credit legislation is that it will furnish the farmers with cheap money, and those who offer this argument in opposition to rural-credit legislation say that the American farmer is improvident and has no business sense, and that he will borrow too much and ruin himself if the rate of interest is lower. The farmers of my State are just as intelligent and capable as the farmers of Illinois and Indiana, where they can get money at 4½ and 5 per cent. Has cheap money ruined the farmers of Illinois and Indiana? Again, some of those who are opposed to rural-credit legislation, with a great deal of solicitude for the farmer, warn him against the dangers to him involved in this legislation and try to make him believe that it is a scheme to involve him in debt and ruin him. While it is true that some farmers are improvident and will go too deeply in debt if given too much credit, the same is true of many merchants, lawyers, doctors, and other classes. The fact is that the great majority of farmers are compelled to go in debt each year and are left with no choice. The young farmer starting out in life and the tenant who owns no land can not procure a home without going in debt. The right kind of rural-credit legislation will not only not ruin the farmer by taking his home away from him, as some would make him believe, but would, so far as land credits are concerned, protect those who already own homes, but which are mortgaged for a short time at a high rate of interest, against loss by foreclosure on account of crop failure or other misfortune. He would be protected under a proper rural-credit system by having his debt turned into an amortized loan so that by payments that are not burdensome he could ultimately discharge his obligations.

Some object to legislation of this kind, insisting that it is a matter that should be left strictly to private capital, and that no Government aid should be given, basing their objections upon their statement that the American farmer is not a serf, as the agriculturists of Europe are classed by them. One of these gentlemen says that to call an American farmer a peasant would be to insult him. Those who offer this objection to any Government aid simply offer the same argument and the same objections that those who are opposed to any rural-credit legislation offer, and therefore this objection demands consideration.

Both of the objectors who make this argument show thereby that they are ignorant of the great economic necessity upon which the intelligent, thoughtful, sincere advocate of rural credit bases his demand for and justifies such legislation. It is true that the American farmer is neither a serf nor a peasant in the sense that these terms are applied to certain classes in Europe. The term "serf" or "peasant," as commonly used in Europe, means a person who is bound to work on a certain estate, and is thus attached to the land and sold with it into the service of whoever purchases the land. True, the American farmer does not belong to this class, but if the economic burden that rests upon his shoulders is permitted to continue and no proper financial facilities are afforded him with which to meet his necessities, little by little, as the census reports show, he will be forced from the home-owning, prosperous class into the tenant and poverty-stricken class, and in the course of the years, if such drift is not checked, many will become economic serfs. What produced the peasant of Europe? What drove the agricultural classes of Europe into serfdom? Did the condition of serfdom follow the law enacted or decrees promulgated governing this class, or did these laws and decrees simply follow the economic and industrial conditions that so ground down the husbandman that the passing of the laws and the promulgation of the decrees were naught but formal assertion of restraints that economic distress had already imposed? The civilized countries of Europe, by their efforts for the past 50 years to remedy the industrial conditions surrounding their agricultural classes by the establishment of rural-credit agencies, have but been applying a remedy for an evil that existed, which evil should have been prevented. Europe by this class of legislation is lifting from the mire of intolerable conditions her agricultural classes, while upon the other hand those who seek this legislation in this country seek it not because the American farmer is a peasant or a serf, but because they do not want the the American farmer to ever become either a peasant or a serf. [Applause.] We propose to so provide for agriculture in this country that the American farmer will continue intelligent, upright, self-reliant, and productive, and not permit the burden of intolerable economic conditions to force him to the last extremity before we recognize his necessities and make the same provision for him that we have long since made for our commercial classes.

Mr. Chairman, I have as best I could in the brief time permitted discussed some of the necessities for this legislation and answered some of the objections that are offered by those who oppose it. For some time I have recognized and called attention to the necessity for farm-credit legislation, and when I entered this Congress, beginning my first term, and the Committee on Banking and Currency, of which I am a member, took up the question of reforming the banking and currency laws I insisted that it was just as important to provide financial machinery adapted to the needs and requirements of agriculture as it was to reform our banking and currency laws, so as to more fully meet the needs and requirements of commerce, and that rural-credit legislation should go hand in hand with the proposed Federal reserve act. I and those of us who were interested in this question pressed our contentions vigorously, both in the committee and on the floor of the Democratic caucus; and while President Wilson and a majority of the Democrats admitted the necessity for this character of legislation, they insisted that they were not ready to act wisely, and that it would be better to frame a rural-credit law separate and apart from the Federal reserve act. At that time President Wilson, in a statement which appeared in the newspapers in discussing the proposal for a rural-credit system, said:

> It should have accompanied and gone hand in hand with the reform of our banking and currency system if we had been ready to act wisely with full knowledge of what we were about.

Finding that a majority of the Democratic caucus agreed with the President that the scope and character of the Federal reserve act were limited to the needs of commerce, and that its immediate and chief purpose could not be made to reach as far as the special interests of the farmer require, and that they seemed to be in perfect accord with the President's statement that special machinery and a distinct system should be provided for the farmers, and as he stated that he regarded such legislation as our next great task and duty, as I have above quoted him, I offered a motion in the Democratic caucus directing the Committee on Banking and Currency to prepare a rural-credit bill and report the same to the next session of Congress, which was to convene the following December. The caucus gave such instructions, and I at that time did not for a moment doubt that these directions would be obeyed by the committee. I thought that with the President of the United States urging the necessity for legislation of this kind, and with him stating that he regarded it as our next great task and duty, and knowing that the Democrats of Congress were willing to carry out his suggestions with reference to matters of legislation, I felt confident that this Congress would perform that great task and discharge the great duty which he said was our next one. Pursuant to the instructions of the Democratic caucus, the Committee on Banking and Currency appointed a subcommittee on rural credits, headed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY], which subcommittee took up the question, and after considerable hearings, and working with a like subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, they jointly framed what has become known as the Bulkley-Hollis bill. I immediately insisted that the full committee should take up this question and consider it, and if we did not favor the plan proposed by the subcommittee the full committee should frame some other plan and present the same to the House for its consideration and action.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that I have been unsuccessful in my efforts to get this question considered by the full committee. At every meeting I have insisted that we take up the rural-credit question and report a bill to the House, and I feel sure that if the full committee will but take up the question we can agree upon a bill and report it to this House within two or three days' time, and then it would be proper to provide for its consideration by a special rule, which expedient has been resorted to in order to pass a great many other bills through this House. By doing this we can yet have time to pass a rural-credit bill at this session of Congress, and if we do not consider and enact such legislation at this session of Congress, and we have an extra session, which now seems probable, I shall renew my efforts in behalf of this legislation and shall not be content until by the enactment of a bona fide, real, practical rural-credit system we shall have given to the American farmer the financial facilities to which he is justly entitled and which are necessary in order that he may be placed upon an equal footing with the privileges enjoyed by the commercial interests of the country under our present banking and currency laws.

Mr. Chairman, why should we longer delay this legislation? Why should we longer deny to the American farmer a rural-credit system which would not only be a blessing to him, give renewed strength to his arm, kindle anew the fires of hope in his heart, but by the increased productiveness and the increased prosperity that would come from his renewed energies bring increased prosperity and plenty to every class?

During the last few weeks we have been engaged in the consideration of the appropriation bills for the annual support of our Army and Navy. These bills together carry about a quarter of a billion dollars, and during their consideration a determined effort was made by some who come from the manufacturing and commercial centers to increase the expenditures and thereby add to the burden of the American taxpayers under the specious plea of national defense.

Mr. Chairman, I am for national defense, but I do not think that the requirements for national defense are limited to an adequate Navy. I am not afraid of the foe from without, with whose threatened and imaginary invasions gentlemen try to excite us into spending increased millions for our military establishment; but I do, as one who loves his country and gives some thought to its continued prosperity and safety, have fears of the canker and deterioration that always flow from economic distress and industrial injustice. No one honors more than I do the men who have fought our battles upon the land, upon the sea; no one has a greater pride in the valorous achievements of the American soldier and sailor, to whom we affectionately refer as "the man behind the gun"; but there are others of whom I think and for whose welfare I plead and in whose welfare and prosperity are wrapped the safety and security of this Republic, and they are not "the men behind the guns," but are "the men behind the plows" and "the men in the overalls." [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, during the past 20 years we have spent upon the American Army and Navy something less than $5,000,000,000, and as compared to this sum, all of which has been wrung from the overburdened taxpayers of this land, the few millions that have been spent in aid of the American farmer seem insignificant and small. While these expensive battleships, each costing many millions, and our standing Army are maintained in idleness and their officers live a life of luxury and ease the American farmer, stooped beneath the burden of his load, by his taxes supports them, and at the same time feeds and clothes the Nation, and with his surplus furnishes us with a balance of trade in our dealings with the nations of the earth.

Is it not time we did something to lighten the burden of the American farmer and equip him with such credit facilities as will enable him to more easily develop the agricultural resources of the country? Is it not true that should war come, the battleships and the standing armies alone will not constitute our defense, but our real defense will be the farmer and his fellow toilers, who in every age and in every land and in every period of the history of this Republic have fought the Nation's battles and borne the brunt of war? [Applause.]

I say, it is the farmer who not only in time of peace brings the balance of trade to our shores, but it is the farmer who in time of war bares his breast in defense of the country he loves. It is the farmer's wife and the farmer's mother who kisses her stalwart husband or her bright-faced boy good-by, and facing the heartache and the toil, the loneliness and sorrow, the danger of the isolated country life, tells him to go down to the red, red field of battle and, if need be, give his life for the common weal. The hand that guides the plow in time of peace is the hand that grips the musket in time of war. [Applause.]

John Trotwood Moore has eloquently described this hand. He says it is a hard hand, it is true, but it is faithful and honest; and in its rough grip more gentleness dwells, more truth and honor lie, than in many another of softer grip and finer strain. It may be rough like the roots of the oak, twisted and hardened, gnarled and knotted in the primal fight for life with the elements of nature, but unbeautiful as it is, it has borne its full burden in the fight of civilization and the battle of the world. It may be misshapen, and its joints large from strain and toil, and the veins may run through it like the channels of a stream deep cut, and it may be curved in like the turn of a plow handle, and shaped like the grip of an ax helve, toil worn and scarred. It is this hand that not only each year feeds and clothes our vast population, but it is this hand that lights the fires in every forge, turns the countless wheels of industry everywhere, girds the continent with glittering threads of steel and hurrying steeds of fire, makes white the seas of earth with sails of commerce, and pours upon all lands and all peoples in every human pursuit the blessings and prosperity which its toil has wrought from the earth. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, it is for the purpose of making the tasks and the burdens of this hand lighter that I plead for rural-credit legislation. Not only does justice to the farmer demand that you grant him this relief, but the prosperity and future of this Nation require that you no longer permit him to be handicapped by the financial shackles that now bind him. Will you by the enactment of this legislation break those bonds and set him free? [Applause.]

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. MANN. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. J. M. C. SMITH].

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I expected to have an opportunity to address the House yesterday, and what I have to say is more germane to the subject which was then under consideration. I wish now, in the brief time allotted to me, to call attention to the question under consideration yesterday—the purchase of ships for a merchant marine. These ships are only to be used in foreign trade and with our insular possessions. The bill has no semblance to one for a merchant marine, and the ships purchased are to revert to the Navy two years after the termination of the European war.

I have no quarrel with any man whose business is that of importing and exporting. If a man is engaged in foreign trade, he is directly interested in it and certainly would be in favor of more ships. Neither have I any quarrel with those who are in favor of more ships for the exportation of American products. But I think I can safely say that no prudent business man in his own business would at the present time engage in the foreign shipping trade. Least of all would he purchase ships for that purpose under present conditions. In the first place, our relations are such that no man would want to engage in that business on his own account, because it is especially hazardous. It was said by one of the speakers here yesterday that we want more ships in order to reduce ocean freight rates. Every man who has followed current events knows that the rates of ocean freights have not been increased because of the lack of ships, but because of the hazardous character of the business. We have no dearth of ships. At the present time we are exporting almost double the amount of our former previous exports, and no one is complaining that there are not enough ships.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. For a question.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the gentleman understand that the German lines—the North German Lloyd and the Hamburg-American Line—have taken off about 200 ships, the most of which were used in American shipping?

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. That may be. A gentleman stated here yesterday that some ships are making 100 per cent a year. When he said that I thought of the Titanic, which, having cost millions of dollars, went to the bottom on her first trip. I thought of the shipping upon our own Great Lakes, which for two years has been almost at a standstill, and the least lucrative employment in which you could engage capital. I say that under present conditions no prudent man would embark upon the business of ocean transportation: First, because of the fierce competition of foreign countries which have thousands of ships operated at less cost than we can operate them; second, because no man would sell bonds given on his property for money to buy ships to run on a venture; third, because engaging in shipping at the present time would be considered an unfriendly act by at least one of the belligerent nations. We have heard complaints from the very nations that purchase our products and materials. And I have heard the partisans of the belligerents complaining about shipping the very products that we are now shipping, while by this bill we are being invited to engage in what I consider a hazardous and precarious undertaking. And still those people that have taken sides in the great struggle that now engages the nations of the Old World are anxious to purchase ships, and for what? In order to aggravate and to increase the very danger that now threatens us. I say that these people who are filing resolutions and sending us petitions asking Congress to prohibit the shipment of munitions of war ought to be a little careful how they favor shipping bills, when they are complaining about our neutrality and our absolute right as a neutral Nation to ship our products of field and factory. I say that we must be careful, and the last thing under present circumstances that we ought to undertake as a Nation is to engage in foreign shipping under any circumstances. England has always been our best customer. She has taken of our products to the value of $600,000,000 annually. Germany has taken of our products to an average balance of $200,000,000; but is there any man who would say that we should engage in shipping when they are declaring even food products, raiment, and I do not know but drugs, contraband of war?

It seems to me that if we wish to be neutral and absolutely stand upon our neutrality—and I certainly want to be as friendly to Germany as I am to any of the other countries, although I may have my preference—we should sell our goods in our own markets and let them take them, if they wish, from our own doorsteps and from our own factories and from our own warehouses. In that way we can preserve our neutrality, but we see our friends here who are filing resolutions, and we know that some of those friends who are sending us petitions would have us buy ships and engage in a most hazardous business, incurring, if you please, not only the unfriendliness of these countries but absolutely inviting war, and I am for peace. [Applause.] Munitions of war means anything that can be used for the prosecution of war or to support war—foodstuff and clothing. When I say I am not for entirely shutting up our factories, and when I say I stand upon the law of nations which allows a neutral country to ship our products of farm and factory to neutral nations, then some gentleman arises here and asks me about the humane side of it, and wants to know if I am in favor of selling them and shipping over there bullets and powder. You have all had the same question asked you, and I look at that man. Of course nobody is in favor of slaughter. I wish the war would stop to-day; this very hour; and I wish that we might not send over there bullets or powder; but I would ask those same gentlemen who are so strong for our neutrality and who do not want us to do any business, who wish us to shut up our shops, if they are in favor of the greatest gun factory in the world shutting up? If they will stop making powder and bullets in England and if they will stop making powder and bullets in Germany, then let us by all means also stop.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Does the gentleman contend that our manufacturers of war ammunition and material have any vested rights in the continuance of foreign wars?

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. No; I do not claim that they have.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Let me ask the gentleman another question. If the exportation of American manufactured war material and ammunition were prevented, does the gentleman think that the American manufacturers of such material have any right to insist that the foreign war shall be continued for their benefit?

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. No.

Mr. BURKE of Wisconsin. Are they in any worse position than if the war had not occurred and peace had continued?

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. I do not think it puts them in any worse condition, but under every law of nations we have a right to do just what Germany did in sending guns and bullets and powder over to Mexico, when we sent our whole Army and Navy down there to stop them, and just as England and Germany did in the Russo-Japanese War, running their factories night and day, on three shifts, to furnish powder and bullets. I am not standing here saying that I am in favor of furnishing bullets and powder to any other nation. Please do not interpret me as saying that. I am just as friendly to one side as to the other. If there is a man who stands neutral, if there is a man who wants to be fair and do justice to each side, if there is a man who has the love of country at heart, if there is a man who wants to keep his country out of trouble and keep out of war, then I am that man. [Applause.] But as a Nation we have a right to exist. No one has ever contended that because two nations went to war we must shut up our factories, and that we must not export food or clothing or drugs, or that we may not send our products to even neutral nations.

Mr. BARTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Just for a question.

Mr. BARTON. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not discriminate and find a difference between sending bread and bullets?

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Oh, yes; but please remember that as a nation we are not making these and as a nation we are not sending them over. In order to be perfectly neutral the gentleman will please understand what my position is, that as a nation we ought not to buy boats to ship products to these nations that are already complaining because individuals and private companies are shipping foodstuffs even to neutral nations. How are we as a nation to escape censure when an individual can not? What do we want of these boats at the present time? Let us avoid even the appearance of evil and not buy ships.

Mr. Chairman, born in one night in a Democratic caucus ending at 2.30 o'clock in the morning, bound by a caucus rule attended only by Democrats, and by them brought into the House next day for immediate consideration, is this bill providing for the appropriation of $40,000,000 of the American people's money out of the Public Treasury of the United States for the purpose of embarking in a scheme of purchasing ships.

There have been no public hearings or opportunity given or afforded to determine the necessity of this expenditure for purchasing ships. The bill was not reported by any committee favoring this expenditure. It was brought before the House by a special rule allowing but three hours on a side for general debate, which, if equally divided between the 424 Members of the House, would not allow one minute to each Member. Bound hand and foot by this caucus rule, the Members are expected to vote blindly for this measure about which they know little or nothing.

It is proposed by this bill that the United States shall form a corporation in the District of Columbia consisting of the Secretary of the Treasury, Secretary of Commerce, and three other members to be appointed by the President, with the consent of the Senate, at a salary of $6,000 each per annum, having for its purpose the right to expend this $40,000,000 in the purchase or construction of vessels or boats to carry mail, passengers, and freight between the United States and its insular possessions and foreign countries. The rates are to be fixed and determined by the shipping board.

This is a very large sum of money. The Treasury at this time is greatly depleted. To supply means to pay the running expenses of our Government it was recently found necessary to levy what is termed an emergency revenue tax to raise $100,000,000 annually. Appropriation bills have been cut to the lowest possible amount. Internal improvements have been held up or denied. The receipts of our Government have been falling off, and the sale of bonds and other ways and means are contemplated to procure money to bolster up our depleted Treasury.

In order to raise this $40,000,000 for the purpose of embarking in this shipping business, it is proposed by this bill to use $10,000,000 of the people's money now in the United States Treasury and by selling Panama bonds therefor. I call attention to the fact that these Panama bonds were issued for the special purpose of constructing the Panama Canal and not for the purpose of buying ships. To use them now in the latter way would be diverting them and defrauding the American people, who favored their issue because of the great, renowned, national project of constructing our great canal. I am not one of those who favor mortgaging and bonding the present or future where it can possibly be avoided. In times of peril, great stress, or public need, it may become necessary, but in the face of present conditions that necessity does not exist.

With these ships it is proposed to bring in products of foreign countries as well as export our own. There is now interchange of commerce, subject to the rules of war, with every nation on earth. They have ships by the thousands. This bill does not even have the merit of requiring these Government ships to be built at home or to be purchased from American owners. That is left discretionary with the board. It does not have the merit of providing that they shall be manned with American seamen and American labor. Nor does it have the merit of saying that they shall engage in our American coastwise trade. The bill provides solely for insular and foreign traffic.

To me, as a business proposition, this scheme for the purchase of ships is one wherein a business man conducting his own private business might be led to purchase foreign ships because they can be built in foreign countries for nearly one-half of what they can be built for in this country; or a business man conducting his own business might equip these ships with foreign seamen because they can be hired for one-half the wages we pay our American seamen. A business man would also look squarely in the face this fact before engaging in the shipping business on his own account, and that is that every foreign country gives great subsidies, amounting in some cases to millions of dollars, as national aid to companies and ships engaged in foreign commerce.

By this bill, if we purchase ships, we take the people's money out of the Treasury to buy them with. After that we must keep up the ships at a great expense. They are subject to great depreciation. And the cost of upkeep and operating them will be more in the hands of the Government than in the hands of private parties.

I recall distinctly to mind when first coming as a Member to this House with what great earnestness we were urged to pass certain measures. At that time this country was enjoying great prosperity. The election had been won because of the high prices of foodstuffs and the necessaries of life. The country was everywhere highly prosperous. Labor was employed. And, although the people took stock in what the Democratic Party stated in making its campaign, those statements, promises, and pledges have not worked well, and the people now will be slow in taking stock in further declarations, promises, theories, and proposals of the Democratic Party.

We were first told the wonders of a competitive tariff enacted along competitive lines. This act has proven a complete failure. It brings neither prosperity nor revenue. Then we were told it lacked the working tools to put it into successful operation and that it would succeed better after the enactment of an income tax and a banking and currency law. Then we were told of the new freedom and that the wheels of prosperity and the hands of industry were fettered by greedy trusts; that we needed a Federal industrial or trade commission. They said give us these tools and "business will bloom and blossom as the rose," to use the expression of our illustrious Speaker. But now, lo, with all these, and with the impetus of a great war, our industries have slackened, business stagnated, and labor remains unemployed. And here comes the slogan, "Give us ships."

Now, of all times, is not the time to make experiments. There are plenty of affairs of state needing our consideration which would make for our betterment and better conserve our national welfare. To go into this scheme is especially hazardous. The people are not demanding this legislation. But they are demanding that we as their representatives shall so regulate and govern our national affairs as to leave us aloof from entangling alliances and win back that high standard of national prosperity which makes for our advancement and happiness, such as we had prior to the present administration and under a protective tariff.

I do not want to be classed as opposed to an American merchant marine. As a national policy I favor it. But from my personal viewpoint the way to reach it is to enter into competition with foreign countries by doing, as a Nation, what foreign countries do—compete as a Nation with other nations. Do not as a Nation go into the boat-building and boat-running business with private owners. Let our ship companies and private owners compete with the ship companies and private owners of other countries, and we, as a Nation, lend them the support given or better support than that given, by foreign nations to theirs. Then American enterprise, industry, efficiency, skill, and intelligence will reap the same reward in its merchant marine that it does in competing with other countries in other endeavors. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH].

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request, to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BARTON].

Mr. BARTON. Mr. Chairman, it is to be regretted that on account of the drastic rule brought in yesterday we could not have the right and privilege that was given us under the Constitution, and which the people of this country expect us to have, in passing on one of the greatest problems confronting us to-day—the creation of a merchant marine.

Democrats have railed for the past decade against gag rule, but when they get into harness they bring in and adopt rules that are more drastic than the procedure under Cannon or Reed. A bill is brought in that has never received the consideration of a committee—ordered in by a caucus and forced through this body without even the privilege of amendment. The bill was not even the work of a secret caucus; it was not the work of the membership of this House; it was the work of the executive department, who brought it to you, and, like young robins, you closed your eyes and opened your mouths and swallowed, regardless of what was brought. By this rule you propose to discharge a committee that has never considered the bill. Your Committee on Rules attaches an amendment that has never been introduced in this House, and your drastic action forbids amendment and limits debate to six hours. Unless the people of this country have decided that a monarchical form of government is preferable to a republican form, they will never set their seal of approval upon such action.

This is a period of our Nation's history when we should, as representatives of the American people, talk, act, and breathe neutrality. We should not stand by watching the great struggle, proclaiming to the world we are neutral, wink the other eye, and ship guns, powder, shot, and shrapnel to the belligerents on either side of the contest.

John Bassett Moore says in his Digest of International Law, volume 7, page 748:

> Much misapprehension as to the quality of the act of supplying contraband articles, such as arms and munitions of war, to the parties to an armed conflict has arisen from the statements so often made that the trade in contraband is lawful and not prohibited.
>
> This statement, when made with reference to the preventive duties of neutral Governments, is quite correct, but if applied to the duties of individuals it is quite incorrect. The acts which individuals are forbidden to commit and the acts which neutral Governments are obliged to prevent are by no means the same; precisely as the acts which the neutral Government is obliged to prevent and the acts which it is forbidden to commit are by no means the same. The supply of materials of war, such as arms and ammunition, to either party to an armed conflict, although neutral Governments are not obliged to prevent it, constitutes on the part of the individuals who engage in it a participation in hostilities, and as such is confessedly an unneutral act. Should the Government of the individual itself supply such article, it would clearly depart from its position of neutrality.
> GREAT BRITAIN RECOGNIZES THAT SUCH ACTS ON THE PART OF INDIVIDUALS ARE UNNEUTRAL.

April 23, 1898, Great Britain warned British subjects by proclamation against doing any act in derogation of their duty as subjects of a neutral power, or any violation or contravention of the law of nations, among which was enumerated the carrying of arms, ammunition, military stores or materials.

From the foregoing it appears that under general international law, as recognized by Great Britain itself, the act of our citizens in exporting arms and ammunition is an unneutral act. If our Government decides to forbid the commission of such unneutral act by its own citizens, can such action on the part of our Government be declared to be unneutral, since its object is to establish neutrality? It seems to me that with this falls the last argument of the opponents of the various measures pending before Congress designed to stop the export of arms and ammunition.

In this connection I desire to call attention to the further fact that there is now on the statute books of Great Britain an act very similar in its wording to House joint resolution 377, conferring discretionary power on the King of England to forbid the export of arms and ammunition; also that nearly all the neutral countries of Europe have since this war began enacted such legislation; also that the German Government during the Spanish-American War stopped the export of such materials on a protest from our minister, Andrew D. White.

We are a Nation that profess peace, yet our present attitude is to place the dollar above the man. For commerce we would sacrifice all. Just to make profits for the manufacturer of instruments of war we refrain from placing an embargo on such munitions. We do not see the difference between bullets and bombs, bread and bacon; we do not see the difference between cannon and cotton. I can not understand this blindness, especially when Holland, Switzerland, Norway, and Sweden have placed humanity above commercialism and have declared an embargo on arms. Why, then, should not we who claim to be the leaders of peace follow their glorious example?

Why, then, should not we enact the resolution against shipping arms to the belligerents; postpone this shipping bill until the war is over and be neutral in the true sense of the word. This shipping bill in my judgment is but another method of injecting ourselves into the strained condition now existing. Who will argue that conditions are so imperative that we can not wait to build our ships until this great war ceases? What is behind this great pressure that is being used daily? The President vetoed the immigration bill on the theory that the people had not passed on it. Have the people passed on the Government buying and sending their ships into the troubled waters of foreign countries? Is not the demand from seaboard speculators and men who will have control of the shipping board instead of the people? What ships can we buy but interned ships? If these ships could be bought without a breach of neutrality, who would they carry freight to? You know, and I know, that only one of the parties to this great contest could be benefitted. Is this the reason for the great pressure? Is it in truth to reduce freight rates? Do you think that shipping risk now is no greater risk than before the war? If you are really so concerned about the freight rates, why so insistent that the railroad rates be increased? Why did not the administration insist on placing a railroad across this continent to prove railroad rates were higher, and help the farmer?

The main argument that is used throughout the discussion is, we want ships to reduce ocean freight rates. In the words of Representative GOOD, of Iowa:

"I would be very glad to vote for a bill to bring about a reduction in those rates. How about that side of the Chamber, whose party in convention in Baltimore adopted a platform promising cheaper railway rates? In the Interstate Commerce case where the eastern roads were asking for an increase of 5 per cent the president of the New York Central lines testified that in 1913 that after setting aside all that was necessary for depreciation, and after setting aside $11,000,000 to the surplus fund, they still had enough to pay 11 per cent on the entire capitalization of the road. The president of the Pennsylvania Railroad testified that in 1913, after setting aside a sufficient fund to cover all of the depreciation charges, they still had net earnings sufficient to pay more than 9.6 per cent on the total capitalization of the Pennsylvania Railroad. Yet, notwithstanding such magnificent earnings, the President of the United States on September 11 wrote a letter which appears in the New York Times of that date under the following headlines:

"President asks aid for railroads—Calls country's attention to the necessity of giving them every possible help—Finds their needs vital—In open leter to Frank Trumbull he insists their credits must be sustained—May seek rate increase—Reopening of interstate ruling of August 1 probably will be asked by eastern lines.

"The President says to Mr. Trumbull:

"Since you read it to me yesterday I have read again the statement you made on behalf of the committee of railroad presidents whom I had the pleasure of meeting and conferring with at my office. It is a lucid statement of plain truths.

"You asked me to call the attention of the country to the imperative need that railway credits be sustained and the railroads helped in every possible way, whether by private cooperative effort or by the action, wherever feasible, of Government agencies, and I am glad to do so, because I think the need very real. * * *

"I am confident that there will be active and earnest cooperation in this matter, perhaps the one common interest of our whole industrial life. * * *

"Cordially and sincerely, yours, WOODROW WILSON.

"Active cooperation! Active cooperation with whom? With whom could the President cooperate? Who had the power to grant the increase? The Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Interstate Commerce Commission alone. The President wanted freight rates increased for railroads that were earning 11 per cent in 1913 after they had paid all operating expenses, charged off all that was necessary for depreciation, and set aside $11,000,000 for the surplus fund. And yet you gentlemen on that side now claim that you are in favor of bearing down on the trusts and putting them out of business and of bringing lower freight rates to the country.' [Applause on the Republican side.]

It is said that we can not get ships to take our produce, yet during the month of December, 1913, we sent abroad 5,000,000 bushels of corn, wheat, oats, and barley, and in December of 1914, 41,000,000 bushels.

This is neither a Government ownership nor a private business. It permits private business to use Government money and credit for their exploitation, while the Government controls a majority of the stock, yet we know that fine, fat berths will be created for men whose main incentive and business will be to hold the job. Then after it is developed, if it should be, the bill proposes to lease the line to private interests—neither Government ownership nor private ownership—the Government a partner for its credit and money and the private interests for what they can make out of the senior partner.

I stand for a merchant marine; but the kind I stand for is ships built in American dockyards by American men, manned by American seamen, and floating an American flag.

The conditions are not so imperative that we can not wait until we build these ships, thus avoiding the danger of purchasing interned ships and sending them into troubled waters. In the interests of peace and neutrality let us pass the resolution against the shipment of arms and ammunition. Let us wait until the war is over before buying and building ships and embarking into new and untried waters, and if there are a few shippers and exporters who want to use the Government money to send their material abroad let them wait until this war concludes, and when we build our merchant marine let us build it without petty partners. In the spirit of peace and neutrality I shall vote against the measure.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, even a Democratic House is occasionally, unintentionally and unconsciously, logical. Yesterday the Democratic membership of the House went through the farce of assuming to launch on the high seas a merchant marine. To-day we passed a bill providing for them when they shall be shipwrecked. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Yesterday we were engaged in the barren enterprise of acting as a recording machine for the Presidential will. To-day we are proposing to search out the barren bottoms of the coasts of Texas. Yesterday witnessed a humiliating surrender by the House of Representatives of its dignity, its independence, its judgment, and its will to the imperious mandate of the President to a degree and an extent hitherto unknown, even in the unparalleled subserviency of this Democratic Congress. The Democratic majority of this House has heretofore yielded to the dictation of the President as to essential and important details of legislation, but not until yesterday did the majority completely surrender the views and opinions of its membership as to the entire plan, scope, and purpose of a fundamentally important proposition.

But this complete and humiliating surrender of judgment and opinion by the majority in a matter of paramount importance does not of itself embrace the full measure of the degredation of the popular branch of the National Congress. Added to that surrender of judgment and opinion was the voluntary abdication by the majority of the functions of this body as a branch of the legislative machinery of the Government. That procedure was for the sole purpose of making a record in support of the dogmatic demands of the President, without hope or expectation that it would result in the enactment by this Congress of the legislation passed upon.

It is bad enough, heaven knows, when the majority of a legislative body, under the whip and spur of executive demand, agrees to make a record which does not express the views and opinions of even a majority of the majority; but it is still worse when this surrender is made, and this record falsifying the judgment of the House is agreed to mainly and essentially for the purpose of saving the face and attempting to sustain in public opinion the dogmatic judgment of the Chief Executive.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. HARDY. Would it not save a heap of time and vocal effort if quite a number of gentlemen who are accustomed to repeat the same thing about the orders from the White House and the caucus would get together and formulate a complete statement and print it on a card and hold it up and say, "I want to say these same things that have been said before."

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I do not know but what it would be a good thing to print not only on cards but on the walls of this Chamber, inside and out, certainly to print on the walls of our hearts, a warning of the effect on free government of the everlasting domination of one man. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for one further question?

Mr. MONDELL. I do.

Mr. HARDY. Does the gentleman think that after dozens of his colleagues have made this statement and nobody has paid any attention to it that he must repeat it in order to get the impression conveyed?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, I do not think my colleagues have made this statement in just the way I have made it. Possibly none of them has made it quite as forcefully as I am trying to make it [applause] when I shall have said what I am about to say.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman is of the opinion that he had to make it plain.

Mr. MONDELL. And the gentleman is of the hope that it may finally find lodgment in the heart of his friend, the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman permit just one further question?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. HARDY. I regret it, but I am fair to say that the gentleman can not speak the English language any plainer than all the Members on his side who have spoken the same thing heretofore.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I am glad that some of these statements of the dangers to this House and to this Government which flow from this usurpation of the Executive and domination over the legislative branch have at last come to the attention of the gentleman from Texas, if they have not as a matter of fact had any influence upon him.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman pardon just one further observation?

Mr. MONDELL. Just a moment. My time flies. I have a few observations I would like to make.

Mr. HARDY. We are sailing along easily. I just wanted to say that it seems to me that I, like everybody else, could repeat it as readily as the Lord's Prayer.

Mr. MONDELL. I want to say another thing while the gentleman is saying that, that so far as I am personally concerned I am not criticizing a Democratic President any more sharply than I would a President of my own political faith——

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Because I believe, as profoundly as I believe anything on earth, that if we shall continue in this Government, increasingly as we have for a few years past, the control and domination of the executive over the legislative branch the day will come when we can not be as proud of our country as we have been in the past.

Mr. WALSH. Did the President ever dictate anything to the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. MONDELL. The President?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Well. the present President has not honored me by expressing his will or desire to me in any way at any time.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman from Wyoming know of any Member of the House that the present President has ever dictated anything to?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, if the gentleman will please drop that.

Mr. WALSH. I ask the gentleman the question. Do not evade it.

Mr. MONDELL. It is bad enough to have everybody know. The bootblacks and the newsboys——

Mr. WALSH. You did not answer the question.

Mr. MONDELL (continuing). The charwomen and all other sundry and divers classes of persons know of the domination of the President over Congress. That is bad enough, but for a gentleman who knows all about it to pretend that it is not notorious is a shrieking farce, of which the gentleman ought to be thoroughly ashamed. [Applause on the Republican side.] If you must be bound, if you think that your duty to your party compels you to do it, be manly enough to admit it.

Mr. WALSH. I was just going to say that I hope to live to see the day when Members of this House will think first of their country as Americans rather than for the welfare of their party as politicians.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I think I have been here longer than the gentleman has, and I think the Members of this House do in the main think first of their country and of their duty, but unfortunately we are none of us perfect; unfortunately we are all subject to temptation; and unfortunately the Executive is in a position to tempt and to coerce. I do not know, and I shall not judge, who is most to blame—the tempter or the tempted.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman think a patriot would make the speech that the gentleman from Wyoming has just made and the statements he has made in the last few minutes?

Mr. MONDELL. I will leave that to the judgment of the people who sent me here.

Mr. WALSH. My judgment is that he would not.

Mr. MANN. He would not want to leave it to the judgment of the people who sent the gentleman from New Jersey here.

Mr. MONDELL. The judgment of the people who left him at home.

Mr. FESS. The gentleman from Texas asks if the printing of certain utterances would not save time. I would like to know if it would not save time to close the doors of this House and put on them, "Closed until further orders"?

Mr. MONDELL. If we did not save time, we would save the pollution of the atmosphere of the corridors from the sulphurous expressions of the gentlemen who voted one way and believed and talked another. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman yield for just one suggestion?

Mr. MONDELL. I am afraid the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has no more time to yield me, and I have a few words I would like to say. But I yield to the gentleman if he wants to ask me a question.

Mr. HARDY. I just wanted to know if it would not have been quicker if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] and the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] as to these observations had not held up the card that I was talking about.

Mr. MONDELL. It might have pleased the gentleman from Texas, who seems to be restive and irritated in the face of the reiteration of these truths, but our object and intent is to make him as uncomfortable as we can in the hope it may remind him of his duty.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman pardon me just a moment? I never was in a better humor nor more pleased than I have been at the continued repetitions of the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. I am delighted. I still have hope for the gentleman from Texas. [Laughter.]

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I was fearful that I did not grasp the force of the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio. He made some remark about closing the doors. He can go on and on outside of the Hall as well as in, for I heard him a moment ago outside of the Hall make a speech. So the closing of the doors of the House would not make any difference.

Mr. MANN. Why does not the gentleman from Oklahoma follow his example and make a good speech?

Mr. MONDELL. Whatever may be said about the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], what shall we say of the howling silence of the gentleman from Oklahoma on the shipping bill yesterday? [Laughter.]

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman pause for a reply?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, if the gentleman insists.

Mr. FERRIS. I believe that some mathematician more competent than myself made the computation that there was about 1.7 minutes apiece, and as the Republican side brought about 15 or 17 roll calls, and each one talked as long as time would permit, there was not a chance for any of us to speak.

Mr. MONDELL. The roll calls did not reduce the time any. There was plenty of opportunity, but there was mighty little inclination on that side. I tried to get in, but could not. I am making a few observations now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I have about a 10-minute speech I would like to make.

Mr. MANN. If you make the speech, all right.

Mr. MONDELL. Will you yield me 10 minutes?

Mr. MANN. I will yield to the gentleman 10 minutes, if he will use the time.

Mr. MONDELL. No one expected the bill that was before us yesterday to become a law. A majority of those who voted for it hope and pray it never will, and their hopes and their prayers will probably be answered and realized, thanks to the patriotism and the staying qualities of the minority in another body. But the bill had failed in another body and in spite of the most persistent touting, advertising, and promoting by the administration, backed and supported by selfish and sinister influences, it has failed utterly to command the support of any considerable proportion of the American people. In this state of affairs, desperate from the standpoint of the administration, an obsequious majority in the House of Representatives was called upon, coerced and cajoled into not only surrendering its views and opinions but into surrendering the dignity, the prerogatives, and the functions of the House that they might be used and utilized for the purpose of recording a decision supporting the presidential mandate—a decision which did not reflect the judgment of the House and which is not expected to be crystallized into law.

Mr. Chairman, I do not make these statements lightly or without reason, for it is notorious that a majority of the majority were not in their hearts favorable to this legislation, and, to their everlasting credit, none of the Republican minority were for it. It is known of all men this legislation has received no indorsement from any important political organization; that it was not sought, as it is not supported by any considerable number of people anywhere. It is understood by all who take the trouble to inform themselves that but for the powerful, persistent efforts of the administration it never would have been seriously considered in either branch of Congress.

Those who reluctantly and shamefacedly supported it excused themselves on the plea that there is an emergency which suggests if it does not justify it. There is, it is true, an unusual and abnormal condition caused by a great war, affecting our ocean-borne commerce on the Atlantic, a condition whose most striking characteristic just now is an unprecedented export of foodstuffs, attended by a tremendous rise in food prices, which just at this time renders the majority of people infinitely more interested in the checking than in increasing exports.

But assuming there were, which there is not, a condition with regard to our export trade harmful to a considerable number of our people, would that constitute a condition that would suggest or warrant the inauguration of doubtful measures of relief at the expense of all our people? If, with a depleted Treasury and a bond issue imminent to meet the ordinary and necessary demands upon the Treasury, we seek to relieve the needs of the American people, the great and pressing emergency for aid and assistance is to be found among the unemployed millions stranded through Democratic mismanagement; these sufferers from Democratic policies need our help rather than those who would further deplete our already sadly depleted reserves of foodstuffs and those who in their greed demand more and swifter ships to carry the implements and instruments of carnage to the blood-stained battle fields of Europe.

If there were in fact a great shortage in ships, checking the reasonable export of our products, and by reason of high rates unduly depressing their price, which conditions do not exist, relief can not be hoped for or expected in the slightest degree through any such measure or proposal as this, or at least not in a degree at all corresponding or commensurate in benefits with the burdens that all the people would be called upon to bear.

Over-sea rates are high, it is true, but not the slightest evidence has been produced tending to show that they are unreasonably high, considering the inevitable delays, due to the congestion of foreign ports and the increased costs and risks, which must be borne by the steamships proposed by this bill as they must by other and private lines. It follows, therefore, that unless it is proposed that the Federal Government shall bear a large portion of the cost of transportation the lines proposed could not make lower rates than the lines now operating. If that is the intent—that the Government shall bear the losses incident to lowering rates below cost of carriage—then the proposition of inviting private capital to participate with the Government in this undertaking is as much of a farce and a fraud as the procedure of passing the bill through this House.

But assuming, for the sake of argument, that we could, without a violation of neutrality involving the probability of war, secure ships not now in use to add to the ocean carrying tonnage of the world, and assuming that eliminating all expectations of contemplated or suggested private participation in this enterprise we should, at vast expense to all the people, reduce the cost of ocean freights and ocean carriage to certain shippers, who would benefit thereby?

The sponsors for this legislation have sought to create the impression that American producers would benefit in advanced prices for their produce to the extent to which ocean freights might be reduced. The fact is that under present war conditions, with freights from all parts of the world to the theater and vicinity of the European war equally advanced, present high ocean rates have but little to do with the price which the exporter on this side of the water receives; still less to do with the price which the producer received, is receiving, or will receive. As an illustration, it is claimed that in six months the trans-Atlantic rate on wheat has advanced from 5 to nearly 20 cents per bushel; in the same period of time the cash price for wheat in this country has advanced between 70 and 75 cents per bushel.

Assuming again, for the sake of argument, that through the medium of this legislation, and at vast cost to the National Treasury to be paid by all the people, the trans-Atlantic rate on wheat might be restored to the rate of six months ago, or reduced 15 cents per bushel. Admitting the claim of the proponents of this measure that such a reduction would be reflected in the price of wheat in this country, we would then have spent millions of the money of all the people for the purpose of benefiting and enriching the wheat dealers and speculators to the tune of 15 cents per bushel on all their holdings in order that they might, in turn, lay an added burden on all the people of the country of a penny or two a loaf upon all their bread.

But, Mr. Chairman, there are no ships obtainable not now actively engaged in commerce except the interned ships of the North German Lloyd, and around these and their suggested purchase and utilization, out of the money provided for by this bill, hangs the dark suspicion of ulterior and sinister motive that clouds and lends nauseating aroma to the atmosphere that surrounds the genesis of this legislation. The purchase of those ships would inevitably embroil us with the allied powers of Europe, and their use would be likely to plunge us in war. Other than these, there are no ships not now actively engaged in commerce, and therefore no others that we could secure for the purpose or with the effect of adding to the available tonnage of the world.

Mr. Chairman, to sum up my opinion of the acts and attitude of the House to-day, I would say that it was a disgraceful surrender by the majority of their will and opinion to the mandate of the President; that it is a lamentable and almost unbelievable abdication by the majority of the legitimate lawmaking functions of this body to the purpose of recording a vote with a view of saving the face and patching up the prestige of the Chief Executive.

As to the measure itself, if it were actually put in operation in the only way that can increase the world's ocean-borne tonnage, it would constitute a gross violation of neutrality and be likely to plunge us into war. Assuming we were to adopt so untenable an attitude and invite such frightful risks, no benefits could flow to anyone except at a cost to all the people out of all proportion to the benefits.

The benefits, if secured, would in the main inure to favored shippers, largely of war material and of agricultural produce, the propriety of the continuation of the export of which is being questioned by many people. Finally, if the benefits to the producer, claimed by the proponents of the measure, were secured through violation of neutrality, at risk of war, and at great cost, the entire Nation, and particularly the poor, would be compelled to bear the burden of the increase in the advanced cost of living. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of Commerce be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, upon the request of the governor of the State of Texas, to assign such officers, experts, and employees of the Coast and Geodetic Survey and of the Bureau of Fisheries as may be necessary to make a survey of natural oyster beds, bars and rocks, and barren bottoms contiguous thereto in waters along the coast of and within the State of Texas, including the compilation of the results of said survey for publication, and for this purpose he is authorized to employ in the District of Columbia and elsewhere such technically qualified persons as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this act.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 1, after the word "publication," insert the words "at a total limit of cost of $10,000."

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I think that amendment is wise and should be accepted, and I am willing, in behalf of the committee, to accept it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. STAFFORD. I rise for the purpose of securing information. Is it contemplated or is it regarded as feasible to inaugurate a survey for the determination of rocks and barren bottoms along the seashore with the idea of propagating any kind of animal life?

Mr. HARDY. Yes; with the idea of propagating oysters.

Mr. STAFFORD. Are oysters generally lodged on bottoms of that kind or any such kind of foundations?

Mr. HARDY. We passed a similar bill with reference to the coast of Maryland, with a view to making a survey and familiarizing the authorities with the proper steps to be taken in order to renew the oyster beds, which had been largely diminished and depleted, and it is a food proposition in this case for those people down there.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has that investigation resulted in extending that work so that it is regarded as feasible to have this oyster industry founded on rocky and barren bottoms?

Mr. MANN. Oysters are planted, you know, and this is to see if the planting is feasible on those bottoms.

Mr. STAFFORD. I did not know that they could be planted on rocky or barren bottoms.

Mr. MANN. "Barren bottoms" in that connection means simply that they have no oysters on them now.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, if my colleague will allow me, I wish to say that oyster farming is one of the well-established industries that we have in our State of Texas.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman does not furnish any information that I did not have before. I wanted to ascertain if it were practicable to raise oysters on bars and rocks, and particularly on barren rocks?

Mr. HARDY. They do on the Chesapeake.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is not an answer to my question either. I am aware of the fact that they raise oysters on the Chesapeake as well as on the Gulf, but my question is whether it is practicable to plant oyster beds on rocks.

Mr. MANN. Those are the places where they do plant them.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Yes. It is in such places that they plant them.

Mr. STAFFORD. I thought they were best grown on a soft bottom rather than on a rocky surface.

Mr. MANN. No. They cling to something.

Mr. HARDY. The gentleman from Wisconsin is like myself in that I am a highland man.

Mr. STAFFORD. Well, I have received information from a gentleman who knows something.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Coast and Geodetic Survey and the Bureau of Fisheries be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to expend, under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce, a sum of money hereafter authorized to be appropriated not exceeding $10,000 in carrying out the purposes of this act, which amount is to be available until used.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, the amendment adopted to section 1 would render section 2 unnecessary and superfluous, and I therefore ask that the bill be amended by striking out section 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] moves to strike out section 2. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be recognized for a moment or two for the purpose of asking the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY] a question. Is this to be a permanent law, on which an appropriation can be hung from year to year?

Mr. MANN. It is limited to $10,000 as a total.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. I asked that because in the framing of the annual appropriation bill for the Department of Agriculture money has been asked for by one or more bureaus for the purpose of engaging in some investigations of that kind.

Mr. HARDY. The amendment made a moment ago at the instance of the gentleman from Illinois, which was plainly put in section 2, was to limit the total expense that might be incurred under this bill to $10,000.

Mr. MANN. And that is to be appropriated hereafter.

Mr. HARDY. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. If this bill is passed, then, and the sum of $10,000 is used, this bill will have served its purpose and die?

Mr. HARDY. It will be at the end; yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. It can not be used as the basis for an annual appropriation hereafter?

Mr. HARDY. Not at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out section 2. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect from the date of its passage.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 3. That is not necessary.

Mr. HARDY. It would go into effect at once anyway?

Mr. MANN. Yes. The department that prepared this did not know.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] moves to strike out section 3. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. UNDERWOOD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration Senate bill 3362, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any one of the amendments? If not, the Chair will put them in gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HARDY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries does not desire to call up any other business to-day.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. HENSLEY, by unanimous consent, was granted leave of absence, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a speech made by the Hon. JULIUS KAHN at Arlington on the occasion of the anniversary of the sinking of the Maine.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS] asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a speech made by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] on the 15th. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CERTAIN CLAIMS OF NORTH CAROLINA—CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that H. R. 21452, which has been referred to the Committee on Claims, be recalled from that committee and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent for a reference of H. R. 21452. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, what is the bill?

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. It is a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to audit and adjust certain claims of the State of North Carolina.

Mr. MANN. The Committee on Appropriations would not have any jurisdiction over it.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. It carries with it an appropriation of whatever sum is necessary for the payment of the claims.

Mr. MANN. How will it do the gentleman any good to have the bill referred to the Committee on Appropriations? It will not make it in order on an appropriation bill unless it was in order before, and the committee will not report it.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. I do not know that I would gain anything by it. I want to say to the gentleman frankly that I have no particular thing that I expect to gain by it.

Mr. MANN. I am not going to object.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. To be frank with the gentleman from Illinois, I do not know that the gentleman who introduced the bill will get any report on it from any committee.

Mr. MANN. I think if the gentleman wants it acted upon at any time, it is probably safer in the Committee on Claims than in the Committee on Appropriations. Although it could be brought in on an appropriation bill, it would be subject to a point of order.

Mr. PAGE of North Carolina. If the gentleman objects, I will not press the request.

Mr. MANN. I will not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Thursday, February 18, 1915, at 11 o'clock a. m.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 18, 1915.

Rev. Robert L. Fultz, of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

O God, we devoutly acknowledge Thee to be our sovereign Lord and Master. We rejoice that Thou hast taught us to call Thee Father. As subjects in Thy kingdom, may our wills be wholly dominated by Thy will. As Thy sons, may we imbibe Thy spirit until our obedience shall be the product of an unearthly affection, and our service joyous and fruitful, inspired by the love of God in our hearts. In the name of Thy Son, our Savior. Amen.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	Norris	Smith, Md.
Bankhead	Hollis	O'Gorman	Smith, Mich.
Brandegee	Hughes	Oliver	Smith, S. C.
Bryan	James	Overman	Smoot
Burleigh	Johnson	Owen	Stephenson
Burton	Jones	Page	Sterling
Camden	Kenyon	Penrose	Stone
Catron	Kern	Perkins	Sutherland
Chilton	La Follette	Pittman	Swanson
Clark, Wyo.	Lane	Pomerene	Thomas
Clarke, Ark.	Lea, Tenn.	Ransdell	Tillman
Culberson	Lippitt	Reed	Townsend
Cummins	Lodge	Robinson	Vardaman
Dillingham	McCumber	Root	Warren
Fall	McLean	Shafroth	Weeks
Fletcher	Martin, Va.	Sheppard	White
Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Sherman	Williams
Goff	Myers	Simmons	Works
Gronna	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.
Hardwick	Newlands	Smith, Ga.

Mr. POMERENE. I was requested to announce that the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] is unavoidably absent, and that he is paired with the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], without the right of either party to transfer the pair.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-eight Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Secretary will read the Journal of the proceedings of the preceding session.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, there was so much audible conversation in the Chamber I was not sure that I understood the Secretary correctly. I understood him to read from the Journal, in referring to the motion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], that the Senate disagreed to the House amendments. I simply wish to find out what the Journal does state about it. It is the first reference in the Journal to the motion of the Senator from Florida.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the part of the Journal referred to.

The Secretary read as follows:

On motion by Mr. FLETCHER, that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the said bill, and ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that seven conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Vice President,

Mr. LODGE asked for a division of the question.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That is enough, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection or correction, the Journal will stand approved as read.

REGENT OF SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

The VICE PRESIDENT announced the appointment of Mr. STONE a member of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution for the term beginning March 4, 1915.

DISPOSITION OF USELESS PAPERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a list of papers, documents, and so forth, on the files of the Navy Department which are not needed in the transaction of public business and which have no permanent value or historic interest. The communication and accompanying papers will be referred to the Joint Select Committee on the Disposition of Useless Papers in the Executive Departments, and the Chair appoints as the committee on the part of the Senate the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE]. The Secretary will notify the House of Representatives of the appointment thereof.

FINDINGS OF THE COURT OF CLAIMS (S. DOC. NO. 951).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a certified copy of the findings of fact and conclusion filed by the court in the cause of Sargeant Prentiss Knut, administrator of Haller Nutt v. The United States, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate No. 36 to the bill (H. R. 20562) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, and agrees to the same.

The message also announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 19545) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

The message further announced that the House agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 20562) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 3362) to authorize the Secretary of Commerce, through the Coast and Geodetic Survey and the Bureau of Fisheries, to make a survey of natural oyster beds, bars, and rocks, and barren bottoms contiguous thereto in waters along the coast of and within the State of Texas, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2335) to provide for the register and enrollment of vessels built in foreign countries when such vessels have been wrecked on the coasts of the United States or her possessions or adjacent waters and salved by American citizens and repaired in American shipyards.

The message also transmitted to the Senate resolutions of the House on the life and public services of Hon. Lewis J. Martin, late a Representative from the State of New Jersey.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

S. 4146. An act granting certain lands to school district No. 44, Chelan County, Wash.;

S. 5449. An act to make Pembina, N. Dak., a port through which merchandise may be imported for transportation without appraisement;

H. R. 19376. An act confirming patents heretofore issued to certain Indians in the State of Washington;

H. R. 19545. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; and

S. J. Res. 187. Joint resolution requesting the President of the United States to invite foreign Governments to participate in the International Congress on Education.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Arizona, which was referred to the Committee on Fisheries and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate memorial No. 3.

To the Congress of the United States of America:

Your memorialists, the Legislature of the State of Arizona, in session assembled, do hereby memorialize and petition your honorable body: That—

Whereas it has been and is the policy and the practice of the Federal Government to aid and assist the several States of the Union in the propagation and cultivation of the food fishes, wherever found practicable; and

Whereas such aid and benefits as have been already given to many of the older States by the Government have not yet been extended to the infant State of Arizona: Now therefore

Your memorialists respectfully pray that the Congress of the United States will enact such legislation and make such appropriation as in its judgment may seem adequate to provide and maintain a Government fish hatchery at some suitable place within the State of Arizona for the purpose of stocking and replenishing the various streams and other bodies of water with food fishes found adaptable to such waters.

The secretary of the senate is hereby directed to forward a copy of this memorial to the United States Senate and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, and a copy to Hon. HENRY F. ASHURST and Hon. MARCUS A. SMITH, United States Senators from Arizona, and to Hon. CARL HAYDEN, Representative in Congress from Arizona.

And our Senators and Representatives are earnestly requested to do all in their power to bring about the legislation herein prayed for.

W. P. SIMS,
President of the Senate.

OSCAR COLE,
Secretary of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a telegram transmitting resolutions of the Legislature of the State of California, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ASSEMBLY CHAMBER,
Sacramento, Cal., February 17, 1915.

Hon. THOMAS R. MARSHALL,
President of United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I have the honor to transmit to you and through you to the House of Representatives the following resolution by Mr. Sharkey:

"Whereas the State of California is most splendidly endowed with rivers and harbors, the improvement of which would have a marked effect upon not only the development of this Commonwealth but of the entire United States; and

"Whereas it is highly desirable, if not essential to wise national legislation and appropriation on rivers and harbors, that the congressional Committees on Rivers and Harbors acquire intimate and personal knowledge of conditions and possibilities with respect to California's rivers and harbors: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Assembly of the State of California respectfully requests and urges the Congress of the United States to empower and authorize its Rivers and Harbors Committees to visit the State of California with the express purpose of personally inspecting all of its harbors and its navigable rivers; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Rivers and Harbors Committees of Congress be invited, and the invitation is hereby issued, to visit the State of California for such purpose; and be it further

"Resolved, That the speaker of the assembly be authorized to appoint a legislative reception and entertainment committee, to be composed of not less than one member from each congressional district of the State of California to be visited by the Rivers and Harbors Committees of Congress; and be it further

"Resolved, That the president of the senate and the speaker of the assembly, the State engineer, and the chairman of the State board of control be ex officio members of said committee; and be it further

"Resolved, That said legislative reception and entertainment committee be authorized to make all arrangements with respect to the itinerary of the visiting committees of Congress; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of this resolution be immediately forwarded to the presiding officers of both Houses of the National Congress."

Resolution read and, on motion, unanimously adopted. The speaker thereupon named the committee.

I have the honor to remain, respectfully, yours,

L. B. MALLORY,
Chief Clerk Assembly State of California.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a petition of the Legislature of the State of Arizona, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the restoration and preservation of the Mission of San Jose de Tumacacori, in Santa Cruz County, in that State, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to prohibit the use of stop watches or time-measuring devices, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the ministers of the Methodist Episcopal Church of five conferences of that church contiguous to New York City, praying for Federal supervision and censorship of motion-picture films, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Atoka, Okla., praying for the enactment of legislation granting a per capita payment to the Choctaw Tribe of Indians, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the Public Forum (Inc.), of New York City, N. Y., praying for the authorization of internal improvements to provide work for the unemployed, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. LANE. I present a memorial of the Legislature of Oregon, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House joint memorial No. 6.

Whereas a large section of the State of Oregon is now infested by wild predatory animals, principally coyotes, which are affected with rabies and are roaming about the country spreading disease and death among live stock of all kinds, also menacing the life of all persons who venture forth upon the highways and the prairies to such an extent that numerous families feel compelled to keep their children away from school; and

Whereas, in order to stimulate the destruction of such animals, the State of Oregon and the several counties of Oregon are expending large amounts of money as bounties in order to put a stop to such great loss of stock and the danger of human life: Be it

Resolved by the Twenty-eighth Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, That the National Department of Agriculture be, and it is hereby, memorialized to institute a scientific investigation in the State of Oregon for the purpose of devising ways and means best calculated to eradicate the evil complained of in connection with the officials of this State and those of the counties affected.

Resolved, That the secretary of state be, and he is hereby, instructed to transmit a copy of this memorial to the honorable Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., and to each Member of the Oregon delegation in both Houses of the National Congress.

Adopted by the house February 1, 1915.

BEN SELLING, Speaker of the House.

Adopted by the senate February 3, 1915.

W. LAIR THOMPSON, President of the Senate.

(Indorsed): House joint memorial No. 6, W. F. Drager, chief clerk. Filed February 12, 1915, at 9.10 o'clock a. m., Ben W. Olcott, secretary of state, by S. A. Kozer, deputy.

Mr. ASHURST. I present a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Arizona relating to the Mission of San Jose de Tumacacori, in Santa Cruz County, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Reresentatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialist, the Second Legislature of the State of Arizona, respectfully represents:

That there stands on the bank of the Santa Cruz River, in Santa Cruz County, Ariz., the ruins of an ancient Spanish mission which at once affords a quaint and striking illustration of the architecture of a day that is gone and a monument to the surpassing zeal of the vanguards of Southwestern civilization.

That this mission, known as the Mission San Jose de Tumacacori, was founded by the Jesuit priest, missionary, and explorer, Father Eusebio Francisco Kino, between the years 1687 and 1690, and is therefore one of the most ancient ruins of its kind within the boundaries of the United States.

That although the ground, 10 acres in extent, upon which this ruin stands, has been set aside by the Federal Government as a national monument, no provision has been made for restoring the partially decayed walls of the mission or preserving the evidences of architectural and artistic skill which they bear, and meanwhile the structure is subject to the ravages of time, the elements, and the carelessness of passers-by.

That it would be an occasion of the greatest regret to the people of Arizona, and for that matter to all people who revere the memory of those religious pioneers who toiled and suffered and died that civilization and Christianity might live and advance, should this visible sign of their devoted labors be permitted to pass away.

Now, therefore, it is highly desirable that this milestone of civilization be effectually preserved, thus to hold its sacred history the fresher, to paint the beloved memories which cluster about it the brighter, and to offer, through the far from vanished beauty of its venerable walls, telling their eloquent story of love, courage, and patience, instruction and inspiration to the visitor: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Second Legislature of the State of Arizona, That the Congress of the United States be, and it is hereby, urged to enact such legislation as may be necessary to effect the aforesaid object, and to appropriate the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to restore and preserve the historical mission of San Jose de Tumacacori; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this memorial and these resolutions be forwarded to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, the honorable Secretary of the Interior, and to the Representatives of Arizona in Congress; and that our Representatives in Congress be, and they are hereby, requested to do all in their power to accomplish the enactment of such legislation.

Passed the house February 8, 1915, by a vote of 31 ayes, 4 excused.

WM. E. BROOKS, Speaker of the House.

Passed the senate February 11, 1915, by a vote of 18 ayes, 1 no.

W. P. SIMS, President.
OSCAR COLE, Secretary.
By C. P. CRONIN, Assistant Secretary.

Mr. ASHURST presented a petition of sundry citizens of Jerome, Ariz., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of ammunition, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. JONES. I present a large number of letters and petitions from the citizens of the State of Washington in favor of the passage of the bill prohibiting the export of arms and munitions of war to belligerent nations, which I move be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented petitions of sundry citizens of Bellville and New Braunfels, in the State of Texas, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of ammunition, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a petition of sundry citizens of Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., praying for the exclusion of certain matter from the mail, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Stephenson, Mich., remonstrating against the exclusion of certain matter from the mail, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. KENYON. I present a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Iowa in favor of the passage of the officers' retired list bill, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The concurrent resolution was referred to the Committee on Pensions and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House concurrent resolution.

Be it resolved by the house (the senate concurring), That the General Assembly of Iowa respectfully petition the Members in Congress of the United States from the State of Iowa that they give their influence and support to the passage of Senate bill 6857 in the Senate of the United States, being an act authorizing the retirement from active service, with increased rank, of officers now on the active list in the Army and who served in the Civil War, and who were honorably discharged therefrom, and who have since served not less than 40 years as a commissioned officer of the Regular Army: Be it further

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this concurrent resolution by the General Assembly of Iowa a copy of same be forwarded to each Member of Congress from this State.

W. I. ATKINSON,
Speaker of the House.

W. L. HARDING,
President of the Senate.

I hereby certify that this concurrent resolution originated in the house.

W. C. RAMSAY,
Chief Clerk of the House.

Introduced February 3, 1915. Adopted February 4, 1915. Messaged to senate February 5, 1915. Adopted by senate February 6, 1915.

Mr. KENYON presented a petition of sundry citizens of Bellevue, Iowa, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of sundry citizens of Boston, Mass., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of ammunition, etc., which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented memorials of the United Association of Post Office Clerks, of Lawrence and Westfield, in the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against a change in the present system of promotion of postal clerks, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present memorials of post-office employees of the city of Chicago and other towns in Illinois relative to the increased pay of clerks in post offices and remonstrating against the contract plan for rural carriers. I ask to have read the two letters marked "A" and "B" and that all the memorials be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The memorials were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and there being no objection the letters referred to were read, as follows:

A.

ILLINOIS RURAL LETTER CARRIERS' ASSOCIATION,
Aurora, Ill., February 15, 1915.

Hon. LAWRENCE Y. SHERMAN,
Senator from Illinois.

MY DEAR MR. SHERMAN: From reading our official paper, which is published at Washington, D. C., and note what it has to say on the subject of the post-office bill, which has been under consideration by the Senate committee, and am very sorry to state that this committee has cut out the increase for the rural-letter carriers, which leaves them the same as before the bill was given any consideration.

The House increased the salary for the carriers, and I hope when this matter comes up for consideration the friends of the carriers in the Senate will do all they can for us, as I feel that we are surely deserving of the increase that was voted us last March and of which only a few got the increase, when it was the intent of you all that every carrier should have 9 per cent increase all along the line.

I hope you will do all you can for the carriers both for the increase and to prevent the contract plan of our Postmaster General from going through, which would be a menace to our service.

Thanking you for the many kind favors in the past and hope you will favor us at this time, with many kind wishes, I am,

Yours, very truly,

FRED. S. PUTNAM,
Illinois State President.

B.

CHICAGO POST OFFICE CLERKS' ASSOCIATION,
Chicago, February 15, 1915.

Hon. L. Y. SHERMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The post-office clerks of Chicago protest against the enactment of the proposed Senate committee amendment, on page 14, lines 10 to 20, of the Post Office appropriation bill.

Under existing law it takes approximately six or seven years for a clerk to reach the maximum grade of $1,200 because of the necessary period of substitution, whereas under the proposed amendment it would take twice the number of years to reach the maximum, which at best is but a living wage for a man who is expected to live and rear his family decently and give his children only the advantage of a fair education.

It is our firm belief that the enactment of this amendment would bring about a most discouraging condition and that many of the best men in the service would be tempted to resign and that the right kind of men would hesitate about entering the service and dedicating their lives to the service and the constant study required on a wage of an unskilled laborer.

We call upon you, sir, as Senator of the great State of Illinois, to do all in your power to prevent the enactment of this amendment, which not only affects so many of the employees, but the efficiency of the service itself.

Assuring you of our deep appreciation of anything you may do, I am,

Sincerely, yours, LOUIS PHILIPP, Jr., President.

Mr. GRONNA. I present a telegram, in the nature of a memorial, from J. A. McElroy, secretary of the Local Branch Association of Post Office Clerks and Carriers, of Grand Forks, N. Dak., remonstrating against the substitution of biennial instead of annual promotions in the service. I ask that the telegram may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GRAND FORKS, N. DAK., February 17, 1915.

A. J. GRONNA,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Local Branch Association of Post Office Clerks and Carriers ask you to kindly oppose amendment to appropriation bill providing biennial instead of annual promotions. This injures the lowest-paid men in the service.

J. A. MCELROY, Secretary.

Mr. GRONNA. I present a telegram from J. E. Cary, of McVille, N. Dak., relative to the grain inspection bill. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MCVILLE, N. DAK., February 17, 1915.

Senator A. J. GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.:

We approve of the Moss bill for Federal supervision of grain grades, believing the bill will minimize the business risk assumed by the merchandise of grain owing to the uncertainty of grading, as it is now done in different terminal markets. This bill would enable them to handle the grain on smaller margins, which should mean better returns to the producer. With uniform grading in all markets, the producer would know what his grain would grade alike wherever it was shipped, enabling him to sell in the best market, freight figured. We think the Moss bill is more practical and can be operated with less uncertainty than a regular Government inspection bill.

J. E. CARY.

Mr. CATRON. I present two telegrams, in the nature of memorials, from post-office clerks and letter carriers of Albuquerque, N. Mex., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ALBUQUERQUE, N. MEX., February 17, 1915.

Senator T. B. CATRON,
Washington, D. C.:

Post-office clerks opposed to amendment on page 14 of Post Office appropriation bill which provides for biennial instead of annual promotions.

J. A. GLESNER,
Secretary Post Office Clerks.

ALBUQUERQUE, N. MEX., February 17, 1915.

Hon. T. B. CATRON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Please use your influence to defeat that portion of Post Office appropriation bill which provides that carriers in first and second class offices receive promotion biennially instead of annually. This means much to us, as we are now the poorest paid of public employees. Thanks for past favors.

ARTHUR HARNITEAUX,
Secretary Branch 504, National Association Letter Carriers.

Mr. ROOT presented petitions of sundry citizens of New York, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of ammunition, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of New York, remonstrating against the exclusion of certain publications from the mail, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of New York, remonstrating against the passage of the so-called ship-purchase bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DU PONT presented petitions of sundry citizens of Wilmington, Houston, Farmington, Milford, Lincoln City, Greenwood, Camden, and Felton, all in the State of Delaware, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of ammunition, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. NELSON presented petitions of sundry citizens of Minnesota, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of ammunition, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented petitions from sundry citizens of Minnesota, praying for the enactment of legislation to exclude certain matter from the mail, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Minnesota, remonstrating against the exclusion of certain matter from the mail, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. BRANDEGEE presented a petition of the Anna Warner Bailey Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, of Groton, Conn., praying that an appropriation of $3,000 be made for the purpose of copying the pension records of the Revolutionary soldiers from Connecticut, on file in the Pension Office Building at Washington, D. C., and placing such copy in the Connecticut State Library, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WORKS presented petitions of sundry citizens of Gustine and Oakdale, in the State of California, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of ammunition, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of San Dimas and Pomona, in the State of California, remonstrating against the exclusion of certain matter from the mail, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. McLEAN presented petitions of the Deutscher Radfahrer Club Eichenlaub, of New Britain; of Lodge No. 462, D. O. H., of Torrington; of Beethoven Lodge, No. 22, O. D. H. S., of Torrington; of the St. Paul's Evangelical Lutheran Church, of Torrington; of the German-American Alliance of Torrington; and of sundry citizens of Torrington, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of ammunition, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 21318) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments, and I submit a report (No. 1000) thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. SWANSON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 5619) to transfer Capt. Frank E. Evans from the retired to the active list of the Marine Corps, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1001) thereon.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 6623) in relation to the location, entry, and patenting of lands within the former Uncompahgre Indian Reservation, in the State of Utah, containing gilsonite or other like substances, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 1002) thereon.

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 18686) to provide for provisional certificates of registry of vessels abroad, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1005) thereon.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 20107) to amend sections 4421, 4422, 4423, 4424, and 4498 of the Revised Statutes of the United States and section 12 of the act of May 28, 1908, relating to certificates of inspection of steam vessels, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1006) thereon.

Mr. JAMES, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 14197) for the relief of the legal representatives of Mrs. H. G. Lamar, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1008) thereon.

Mr. MYERS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 21200) quieting title to a certain tract of land located in the city of Guthrie, Okla., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 1003) thereon.

JOSEPH ELIOT AUSTIN.

Mr. TILLMAN. From the Committee on Naval Affairs I report back favorably with an amendment the bill (H. R. 2642) to authorize the President to reinstate Joseph Eliot Austin as an ensign in the United States Navy, and I submit a report (No. 1010) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I should like to hear the bill read. Meanwhile I reserve the right to object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to reinstate former Midshipman Joseph Eliot Austin in the United States Navy with the rank of ensign, and, after one year's service as ensign, he shall be promoted to the grade of lieutenant, junior grade, to take rank with and next after Aquilla Gibbs Dibrill, lieutenant, junior grade: Provided, That the said Joseph Eliot Austin, after one year's service as ensign, shall establish to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy, by examination pursuant to law, his physical, mental, moral, and professional fitness to perform the duties of lieutenant, junior grade, in the Navy.

Mr. LODGE. This is not one of the "plucking board" cases, is it?

Mr. TILLMAN. No. This is the case of a man who was turned out of the Navy because he got married; that is all.

Mr. LODGE. Then I think the bill ought to be passed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am in favor of the passage of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with an amendment on page 1, line 4, after the word "Senate," to strike out the remainder of the bill and insert:

To appoint Joseph Eliot Austin an ensign in the United States Navy to take rank at the foot of the list: Provided, That he shall establish to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy, by examination pursuant to law, his physical, mental, moral, and professional fitness to perform the duties of ensign.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

STEAMBOAT-INSPECTION SERVICE.

Mr. CRAWFORD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 20281) to provide for the appointment of certain assistant inspectors, Steamboat-Inspection Service, at ports where they are actually performing duty, but to which they are at present detailed, and I submit a report (No. 1007) thereon.

Mr. President, inasmuch as there is on the calendar Senate bill 6782, being Order of Business No. 735, which is identical with the House bill, I ask that the House bill just reported by me be substituted on the calendar for the Senate bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that action will be taken.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I move that Senate bill 6782, with like title, be postponed indefinitely.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 20282) to provide for the appointment of 11 supervising inspectors, Steamboat-Inspection Service, in lieu of 10, and I submit a report (No. 1009) thereon. I ask that the House bill be substituted for the Senate bill on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that action will be taken.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that Senate bill 6781, with like title, be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. SHEPPARD. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 17907) granting the consent of Congress to the Interstate Bridge & Terminal Co., of Muscatine, Iowa, to build a bridge across the Mississippi River, and I submit a report (No. 1004) thereon. I call the attention of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] to the report.

Mr. KENYON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. LEA of Tennessee:

A bill (S. 7671) granting an increase of pension to William J. Mester; to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 7672) for the relief of heirs or estate of Jacob Joyner, deceased (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. SHAFROTH:

A bill (S. 7673) granting an increase of pension to Enoch M. Martin;

A bill (S. 7674) granting an increase of pension to George Osten;

A bill (S. 7675) granting a pension to Almira Graham;

A bill (S. 7676) granting an increase of pension to John Kremmer; and

A bill (S. 7677) granting a pension to Lucy J. Lindsey; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. O'GORMAN:

A bill (S. 7678) granting a pension to Chester B. Goodenough (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. REED:

A bill (S. 7679) granting an increase of pension to Andrew Houlihan;

A bill (S. 7680) granting an increase of pension to Samuel S. Householder; and

A bill (S. 7681) granting an increase of pension to James B. H. McDaniel (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

PROPOSED BUDGET SYSTEM.

Mr. KENYON. I introduce a joint resolution and ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 241) creating a commission to prepare a budget system for the Government of the United States, with reference to its appropriations, estimates, and revenues, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Joint resolution creating a commission to prepare a budget system for the Government of the United States with reference to its appropriations, estimates, and revenues.

Whereas in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1911, is found the following recommendation:

"The impulse toward the development of so much of a responsible budget system as our form of government will permit was very much in evidence a couple of years ago. It, however, has not been sustained and has almost disappeared. I have referred to the matter in my previous annual reports, and feel as strongly as ever that something should be done to organize the divided consideration now given the expenditures of the Government and the interrelation of its income and outgo. The responsibilities relative to estimates, appropriations, and revenues are extremely scattered and disintegrated. The vast sums that pass through the Treasury coming and going are without any centralized study or recommendation such as other countries find it necessary to give to their Government finances." And

Whereas no action has been taken by Congress with reference to such recommendation; and

Whereas the expenditures of the Government are gradually increasing, so that they now reach an enormous sum per annum; and

Whereas various and numerous committees in Congress pass on appropriation bills, and there is no correlation between the various committees nor any system of review of appropriations asked for by the various departments of the Government; and

Whereas there should be substantial cooperation between the executive and legislative departments of the Government with reference to the interrelation of revenues and expenditures; and

Whereas other nations have adopted and put into operation budget systems resulting in great saving to the Government; and

Whereas some new system should be adopted in this Nation covering the question of estimates, appropriations, and revenues of the Government; and

Whereas to map out such a new system will require great study and labor: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That a joint commission to undertake the preparation of some budget system for the Government of the United States with reference to its appropriations, estimates, and revenues is hereby established; its membership to consist of the Secretary of the Treasury, three Members of the Senate appointed by the Vice President, three Members of the House appointed by the Speaker of the House, and two economists to be appointed by the President of the United States.

No compensation is to be paid to any member of this commission except to the two appointees of the President, they to receive such compensation as the balance of the commission may determine.

It shall be the duty of said commission to prepare a plan for a budget system for the Government of the United States, and with its recommendations relating thereto to present said plan to Congress on or before the 1st of July, 1916, the said commission to terminate at that time.

To carry out the provisions of the resolution there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $20,000.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I desire to know what disposition of that joint resolution is proposed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa requests that it be referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I can not conceive why that committee should have jurisdiction of a matter of this sort.

Mr. KENYON. I thought that committee would have as much jurisdiction as any other and would not be so busy that it could not take up the matter.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It seems to me that the joint resolution ought to go to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. KENYON. I am not certain whether it should go to that committee or to the Committee on Finance or to any of the other committees having jurisdiction of appropriations. I should like to have it go to some committee where there would be some action taken.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Certainly the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department has no peculiar relation to the matter.

Mr. KENYON. It has no peculiar relation to the subject, but that committee is not so busy as some other committees.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I presume that the Senator understands that legislation on this subject is impossible at the present session of Congress.

Mr. KENYON. Yes; I understand that, of course.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. So that it is not a very vital matter; but, for the regularity of the proceedings, I simply want to suggest that the joint resolution ought not to go to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department.

Mr. KENYON. Where does the Senator think it should properly go?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I think it should properly go to the Committee on Appropriations. It deals with appropriations, and it seems to me that committee naturally would have jurisdiction of the subject.

Mr. KENYON. Very well; I will accept the suggestion. I hope the joint resolution may receive some consideration at the hands of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. BANKHEAD submitted an amendment authorizing the President to appoint George W. Littlehales professor in the grade of mathematics of the Navy, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Naval appropriation bill (H. R. 20975), which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment providing that classified civil service per diem employees of the clerical, drafting, inspection, chemical, messenger, and watch forces at navy yards, naval stations, and other outside offices of the Navy Department be granted 30 days' annual leave with pay, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Naval appropriation bill (H. R. 20975), which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered to be printed.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. GALLINGER. I submit an amendment in the nature of a substitute for section 10 of the bill S. 5259, the ship-purchase bill, which I ask may lie on the table and be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan submitted an amendment to the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 5259) to establish one or more United States Navy mail lines between the United States and South America and between the United States and the countries of Europe, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

STOCK-RAISING HOMESTEADS.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask for the regular order, so that we may finish the morning business.

Mr. ASHURST. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will wait until I state my request for unanimous consent.

Mr. LODGE. I beg pardon. I thought the Senator was going to move to take up a bill.

Mr. ASHURST. I was going to ask unanimous consent. I was about to say when my friend the Senator from Massachusetts took charge of the affairs of the Senate that I wished to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Calendar No. 829, being House bill 15799, to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes, which bill, I believe, passed the House of Representatives unanimously. It was unanimously reported favorably by the Senate Committee on Public Lands; and I ask at this time to submit and have placed in the RECORD a copy of the House report on the bill. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. SMOOT. I object, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the House report being printed in the RECORD?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I have no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is ordered, then.

The House report is as follows:

[House Report No. 626, Sixty-third Congress, second session.]

TO PROVIDE FOR STOCK-RAISING HOMESTEADS.

Mr. FERGUSSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, submitted the following report to accompany H. R. 15799:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 15799) to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to submit the following report:

The committee unanimously recommend that said bill do pass.

H. R. 9582 and H. R. 10539, on the same general subject, had previously been referred to your committee. H. R. 9582 reads as follows:

"A bill to provide for the disposition of grazing lands under the homestead laws, and for other purposes.

"Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act it shall be lawful for any person qualified to make entry under the homestead laws of the United States to make a grazing-homestead entry for not exceeding 640 acres of unappropriated public lands, in reasonably compact form: Provided, however, That the lands so entered shall either be such lands as theretofore have been designated by the Secretary of the Interior as "grazing-homestead lands" or such lands as shall theretofore have been designated by the Secretary of the Interior as not being, in his opinion, susceptible of successful irrigation at a reasonable cost from any known source of water supply, as provided in section 1 of an act entitled "An act to provide for an enlarged homestead," approved February 19, 1909.

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, on application or otherwise, to designate lands the surface of which is, in his opinion, chiefly valuable for grazing, which do not contain merchantable timber, and which are not susceptible of irrigation at reasonable expense from any known source of water supply as grazing land subject to entry under this act.

"SEC. 3. That any qualified homestead entryman may make entry under the homestead laws of lands so designated by the Secretary of the Interior, according to legal subdivisions, in areas not exceeding 640 acres, subject to the provisions of this act, and secure title thereto by compliance with the terms of the homestead laws: Provided, That in lieu of cultivation, as required by the homestead laws, the entryman shall be required to make permanent improvements upon the lands entered, tending to increase the value of the same for agricultural and stock-raising purposes, of the value of not less than $1.25 per acre. And the inclosing by a substantial fence of the land so entered and the discovery of water in a well or wells within the boundaries of such entry shall be held to be permanent improvements under the terms of this act.

"SEC. 4. That any homestead entryman of lands of the character herein described, who has not submitted final proof upon his existing entry, shall have the right to enter, subject to the provisions of this act, other lands contiguous to, or within 10 miles of his said homestead entry, which shall not, with the lands so already entered, owned, and occupied by him, exceed the aggregate of 640 acres; and residence continued and improvements made upon the original homestead subsequent to the making of the additional entry, shall be accepted as equivalent to actual residence and improvements made upon the additional land so entered; but the improvements must equal $1.25 for each acre within the original and additional entries: Provided, That persons who have acquired title to lands of the character herein described under the homestead laws and who own and reside upon the lands so acquired, may, subject to the provisions of this act, make additional entry for and obtain patent to public lands, designated for entry under the provisions of this act, contiguous to or within 10 miles of their said original entry, which, together with the area theretofore acquired under the homestead laws, shall not exceed 640 acres, on proof of expenditures on account of permanent improvements upon the original or additional entry of the required amount reckoned on the area of both entries.

"SEC. 5. That any person who has made entry under the homestead laws, but from any cause has lost, forfeited, or abandoned the same, shall be entitled to the benefits of this act as though such former entry had not been made, and any person applying for a homestead under this act shall furnish the description and date of his former entry: Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to any person whose former entry was canceled for fraud.

"SEC. 6. That all entries made and patents issued under the provisions of this act shall be subject to and contain a reservation to the United States of all the minerals and coal in the lands so entered and patented, together with the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same. The mineral and coal deposits in such lands shall be subject to disposal by the United States in accordance with the provisions of the mineral and coal land laws in force at the time of such disposal. Any person qualified to locate and enter mineral or coal deposits, or having the right to mine and remove the same under the laws of the United States, shall have the right at all times to enter upon the lands entered or patented, as provided by this act, for the purpose of prospecting for minerals or coal therein, upon the approval by the Secretary of the Interior of a bond or undertaking to be filed with him as security for the payment of all damages to the crops and improvements on such lands by reason of such prospecting. Any person who has acquired from the United States the mineral or coal deposits in any such land, or the right to mine and remove the same, may reenter and occupy so much of the surface thereof as may be required for all purposes reasonably incident to the mining and removal of the mineral or coal, upon payment of the damages caused thereby to the owner thereof, or upon giving a good and sufficient bond or undertaking to be approved by the court in an action instituted in any competent court to ascertain and fix said damages.

"SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to make all necessary rules and regulations in harmony with the provisions and purposes of this act for the purpose of carrying the same into effect."

H. R. 9582 was by this committee referred to the Department of the Interior for examination and report. The report of said department is in the following words:

"DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
"Washington, January 30, 1914.

"Hon. SCOTT FERRIS,
"Chairman Committee on the Public Lands,
"House of Representatives.

"SIR: Referring to H. R. 6637 and H. R. 9582, bills designed to modify the homestead laws as to public-land areas to which present laws are deemed not well adapted, I have to advise as follows:

"The existing homestead laws of the United States show an evolution or adaptation to conditions which developed, or were found to exist, as public-land settlement and entry progressed. The general homestead laws carried into sections 2280–2291 of the Revised Statutes, and under which the public lands in the Mississippi Valley and in other portions of the United States where soil, rainfall, and climate justified it were entered, limited the maximum area which might be entered and acquired to 160 acres. In irrigation projects constructed by the United States under the provisions of the act of June 17, 1902 (32 Stat., 388), the area which might be entered was fixed by the Secretary of the Interior through the establishment of farm units, each supposed to be sufficient for the support of a family, and in no case exceeding 160 acres. In other sections of the country, particularly high plateaus of the intermountain States, there are areas which will not produce remunerative crops under the ordinary methods of farming, but which will, through the soil-fallowing and moisture-conservation methods of dry farming, produce profitable crops of wheat and other grains. For this class of lands Congress enacted what are known as the enlarged-homestead laws of February 19, 1909 (35 Stat., 639), and June 17, 1910 (36 Stat., 531), under which not exceeding 320 acres may be entered, upon condition of the cultivation to agricultural crops of a prescribed acreage annually.

"In the sand-hill country of western Nebraska, an area to which none of the laws heretofore described were found adapted, Congress by the act of April 28, 1904 (33 Stat., 547), permitted the entry of not exceeding 640 acres of land, upon condition that entrymen comply with the homestead laws as to residence, improvement, and cultivation, and also place upon the land entered permanent improvements of the value of not less than $1.25 per acre. The settlement, home-making, and agricultural development which followed the enactment of these laws is well known and need not be here described. There remain, however, as indicated, vast areas of the public lands to which none of the foregoing laws seem well adapted, and I am of opinion that the time has arrived when a new form of homestead law should be enacted peculiarly adapted thereto. The lands I have in mind, because of their arid or semiarid character, or because of their location on mountain tops or sides, will not produce agricultural crops for sale or exportation in sufficient quantities to justify acquirement thereof and residence thereon under the existing laws. They do, however, possess some value for grazing purposes and often include tracts of greater or less extent upon which might be grown forage crops, such as kaffir corn, milo maize, fodder, or other rough feed, of little value for sale and transportation, but valuable for winter feed or for the fattening of range stock. I believe that with this class of lands a homestead of 640 acres of land would enable bona fide home seekers to establish and maintain homes for the purpose of stock raising and for such farming operations as will enable them to raise their own supply of rough feed for the stock pastured upon the remaining lands entered or acquired.

"Therefore, instead of enacting H. R. 6637 and H. R. 9582, I recommend the enactment of a general measure applicable to lands of this character wherever found in the public domain, and I inclose for your consideration and for introduction, if you deem advisable, draft of bill designed to accomplish this result.

"For the protection of the entrymen, as well as to prevent the entry of lands susceptible of irrigation, containing valuable merchantable timber, or principally valuable for purposes other than those expressed in this act, it is provided that lands shall, before being subject to entry, be designated by the Secretary of the Interior. All minerals within the land are reserved to the United States, together with the right of qualified persons to prospect upon, locate, and enter such deposits under such restrictions as will prevent the destruction or injury of permanent improvements of the entrymen or patentees or of crops upon their lands. This provision, like the requirement that the lands shall first be designated for entry, will operate to protect entrymen from protests and contests, either by individuals or the United States, because of character of the land and which would otherwise result in cancellation of entries made. Another reason for the reservation of the minerals is that this law will induce the entry of lands in those mountainous regions of the United States where deposits of minerals are known to exist or are likely to be found. To issue unconditional patents for these comparatively large entries under the homestead laws might withdraw immense areas from prospecting and mineral development and without such reservation the disposition of these lands in the mineral country under agricultural laws would be of doubtful advisability.

"The farmer stockman is not seeking and does not desire the minerals, his experience and efforts being in the line of stock raising and farming, which operations can be carried on without being materially interfered with by the reservation of minerals and the prospecting for a removal of same from the land.

"Because of the fact that the lands designated will be principally valuable for grazing and that the farming operations will be limited to the growing of forage, no specific requirement is made as to cultivation of the land, but instead the entryman is required to place permanent improvements upon the land entered, tending to increase its value for stock-raising purposes, of not less than $1.25 per acre, one-half thereof to be placed on the land within three years after entry. Those who have already entered lands of this character under existing laws in amounts of less than 640 acres, or who have acquired such limited areas by purchase from others, should, in my opinion, be placed on an equal footing with those who make entry after the passage of this law, and provision has therefore been made for the making of additional entries for contiguous lands by such entrymen or landowners, upon condition that the entryman or landowner is the head of a family or has arrived at the age of 21 years and is a citizen of the United States and resides upon and occupies the land entered or owned by him. In some cases it may not be possible for such entrymen and landowners to exercise the right of additional entry because of the fact that no vacant lands adjoin. In such cases the bill provides for the surrender of the lands so held and owned to the United States, after which the party so relinquishing or reconveying may make original entry under this act of not exceeding 640 acres of land, upon which he must comply with all the requirements of this act and of the homestead laws.

"This provision will cause an adjustment of holdings in such areas, and the lands so surrendered to the United States may in turn be entered by the entrymen or owners of the adjoining tracts. In this connection, provision is made for the exercise of a preference right of entry within 90 days after the passage of the act by the entryman or owner of adjoining land, and provision made that where vacant lands contiguous to the tracts owned and held by two or more persons entitled to additional entry are not sufficient in amount to enable each to secure the maximum amount to which entitled for an equitable division of the lands applied for among the several entrymen or owners. The purpose of the law being to secure the establishment of permanent homes upon the land entered, the bill provides that the commutation provisions of the homestead laws shall not apply to such entries. A bill introduced in the House of Representatives (H. R. 6637) proposes to provide for a grazing homestead of not less than 640 acres and not exceeding 1,280 acres in area. The bill herewith transmitted is not designed to apply to or provide for the entry of lands suitable only for grazing. The maximum area permitted to be entered thereunder, and even the maximum area prescribed in H. R. 6637, would be wholly insufficient for the support of a homesteader and his family upon lands of that character. As already explained, the measure I have prepared is believed to be adapted to lands which possess a grazing value, which also, in part at least, may be utilized by the homesteader for the raising of forage crops. It would be an exceedingly difficult and expensive task to attempt at this time to classify and designate areas or blocks of land suitable only for grazing and set them apart for disposition in areas sufficient for the support of a family. Existing appropriations and the present force of the department are wholly inadequate for this purpose. It is believed that for the present this classification should be accomplished through the method already described, whereby the lands will be open to disposition under the existing laws and under the bill herein proposed, after which, with the information then before it, Congress may enact such other and additional laws as may be determined to be best adapted to the development and disposition of the remaining areas suitable only for grazing.

"As intimated at the beginning of this letter, I believe that this particular bill will meet a situation not covered by any of the existing land laws and will result in the early development of a very large area of our public lands, which will otherwise remain in an uninhabited and unproductive condition.

"Respectfully,

A. A. JONES,
"First Assistant Secretary."

"A bill to provide for stock-raising homesteads.

"Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act it shall be lawful for any person qualified to make entry under the homestead laws of the United States to make a stock-raising homestead entry for not exceeding 640 acres of unappropriated public land in reasonably compact form: Provided, however, That the land so entered shall theretofore have been designated by the Secretary of the Interior as 'stock-raising lands.'

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, on application or otherwise, to designate as subject to entry under this act lands, the surface of which is, in his opinion, chiefly valuable for grazing or raising forage crops, and which, in his opinion, do not contain merchantable timber and are not susceptible of irrigation from any known source of water supply.

"SEC. 3. That any qualified homestead entryman may make entry under the homestead laws of lands so designated by the Secretary of the Interior, according to legal subdivisions, in areas not exceeding 640 acres, and in compact form, so far as may be subject to the provisions of this act, and secure title thereto by compliance with the terms of the homestead laws: Provided, That instead of cultivation as required by the homestead laws, the entryman shall be required to make permanent improvements upon the land entered tending to increase the value of the same for stock-raising purposes, of the value of not less than $1.25 per acre, and at least one-half of such improvements shall be placed upon the land within three years after the date of entry thereof.

"SEC. 4. That any homestead entryman of lands of the character herein described who has not submitted final proof upon his existing entry shall have the right to enter, subject to the provisions of this act, such an amount of contiguous public lands designated under this act as shall not, together with the amount embraced in his original entry, exceed 640 acres, and residence upon and improvements made on the original entry shall be credited on both entries, but the improvements must equal $1.25 per each acre within the original and additional entries.

"SEC. 5. That persons who have submitted final proof or acquired title to lands of the character herein described under the homestead laws, and who own and reside upon the land so acquired, may, subject to the provisions of this act, make additional entry for and obtain patent to contiguous public lands designated for entry under the provisions of this act, which, together with the area theretofore acquired under the homestead law, shall not exceed 640 acres, on proof of expenditure on account of permanent improvements upon the original or additional entry of the required amount reckoned on the area of both entries.

"SEC. 6. That any person who is the head of a family, or who has arrived at the age of 21 years and is a citizen of the United States, who has acquired title to lands of the character herein described, by purchase or under agricultural public-land laws other than the homestead law, and who owns and resides upon the lands so acquired, may, subject to the provisions of this act, make additional entry for and obtain patent to contiguous public lands designated for entry under the provisions of this act, which, together with the area theretofore acquired and held, shall not exceed 640 acres, and obtain patent therefor upon proof of the expenditure on account of permanent improvements upon the land so owned, or the additional entry, of the required amount reckoned on the area of all lands so acquired and held, and upon proof that he has maintained residence upon either the privately owned land or the land embraced within the additional entry for not less than three years from and after the date of the additional entry.

"SEC. 7. That any person who is the head of a family, or who has arrived at the age of 21 years and is a citizen of the United States, who has entered or acquired, under the homestead laws or otherwise, prior to the passage of this act, less than 640 acres of land, and who is unable to exercise the right of additional entry herein conferred because no vacant lands adjoin the tract so entered or acquired, may, upon submitting proof that he resides upon and has not sold or incumbered the land entered or acquired, reconvey to the United States the land so occupied and entered or acquired, and in lieu thereof enter and acquire title to not exceeding 640 acres of land designated under this act, but must show compliance with all the provisions of the homestead law and of this act respecting the new entry.

"SEC. 8. That the commutation provisions of the homestead laws shall not apply to any entries made under this act.

"SEC. 9. That any person who has made entry under the homestead laws, but from any cause has lost, forfeited, or abandoned the same, shall be entitled to the benefits of this act as though such former entry had not been made, and any person applying for a homestead under this act shall furnish a description of his former entry: Provided, That the provisions of this section shall not apply to any person whose former entry was canceled for fraud.

"SEC. 10. That any homestead entrymen or landowners who shall be entitled to additional entry under this act shall have for 90 days after the designation under this act of lands contiguous to those entered or owned and occupied by him the preferential right to make additional entry as provided in this act: Provided, That where vacant lands contiguous to the lands of two or more entrymen or landowners entitled to additional entries under this section are not sufficient in amount and area to enable such entrymen to secure by additional entry the maximum amounts to which they are entitled, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make an equitable division of the lands applied for hereunder among the several entrymen or landowners, applying to exercise preferential rights, such division to be in tracts of not less than 40 acres, and so made as to equalize as nearly as possible the area which such entrymen and landowners will acquire by adding the tracts embraced in additional entries to the lands originally held or owned by them: Provided further, That where but one 40-acre tract of vacant land may adjoin the lands of two or more entrymen or landowners entitled to exercise preferential right hereunder, the tract in question may be entered by the person who first submits to the local land office his application to exercise said preferential right.

"SEC. 11. That all entries made and patents issued under the provisions of this act shall be subject to and contain a reservation to the United States of all the coal and other minerals in the lands so entered and patented, together with the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same. The coal and other mineral deposits in such lands shall be subject to disposal by the United States in accordance with the provisions of the coal and mineral land laws in force at the time of such disposal. Any person qualified to locate and enter the coal or other mineral deposits, or having the right to mine and remove the same under the laws of the United States, shall have the right at all times to enter upon the lands entered or patented, as provided by this act, for the purpose of prospecting for coal or other mineral therein, provided he shall not injure, damage, or destroy the permanent improvements of the entryman or patentee, and shall be liable to and compensate the entryman or patentee for all damages to the crops on such lands by reason of such prospecting. Any person who has acquired from the United States the coal or other mineral deposits in any such land or the right to mine and remove the same, may reenter and occupy so much of the surface thereof as may be required for all purposes reasonably incident to the mining or removal of the coal or other minerals, (1) upon securing the written consent or waiver of the homestead entryman or patentee; (2) upon payment of the damages to crops or other tangible improvements to the owner thereof, where agreement may be had as to the amount thereof; or (3) in lieu of either of the foregoing provisions, upon the execution of a good and sufficient bond or undertaking to the United States for the use and benefit of the entryman or owner of the land, to secure the payment of such damages to the crops or tangible improvements of the entryman or owner, as may be determined and fixed in an action brought upon the bond in a court of competent jurisdiction against the principal and sureties thereon, such bond to be in form and in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior and to be filed with and approved by the register and receiver of the local land office of the district wherein the land is situate, subject to appeal to the Commissioner of the General Land Office: Provided, That all patents issued for the coal or other mineral deposits herein reserved shall contain appropriate notations declaring them to be subject to the provisions of this act with reference to the disposition, occupancy, and use of the surface of the land.

"SEC. 12. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to make all necessary rules and regulations in harmony with the provisions and purposes of this act for the purpose of carrying the same into effect."

The committee thereupon substituted the draft of the bill prepared and recommended by the department and made a part of its said report, by striking out all after the enacting clause of H. R. 9582 and inserting the said draft recommended by the department in lieu thereof.

Thereupon hearings were held jointly upon said bills, to wit, H. R. 9582, amended as aforesaid, and H. R. 10539, and the advocates of each bill fully heard. Reference is here made to said hearings, which have been duly printed.

After such hearings and after exhaustive consideration by the committee of said bill H. R. 9582, amended as aforesaid, and the adoption of many amendments, the committee directed the reintroduction of H. R. 9582 as so amended, and the same was reintroduced accordingly and has been printed as H. R. 15799, which reads as follows:

"A bill to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes.

"Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act it shall be lawful for any person qualified to make entry under the homestead laws of the United States to make a stock-raising homestead entry for not exceeding 640 acres of unappropriated unreserved public land in reasonably compact form: Provided, however, That the land so entered shall theretofore have been designated by the Secretary of the Interior as 'stock-raising lands.'

"SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, on application or otherwise, to designate as stock-raising lands subject to entry under this act lands the surface of which is, in his opinion, chiefly valuable for grazing and raising forage crops, do not contain merchantable timber, and not susceptible of irrigation from any known source of water supply, and are of such character that 640 acres are reasonably required for the support of a family: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior shall not designate for entry under this act lands of such character that, in his opinion, 640 acres will not support a family.

"SEC. 3. That any qualified homestead entryman may make entry under the homestead laws of lands so designated by the Secretary of the Interior, according to legal subdivisions, in areas not exceeding 640 acres, and in compact form so far as may be subject to the provisions of this act, and secure title thereto by compliance with the terms of the homestead laws: Provided, That instead of cultivation as required by the homestead laws the entryman shall be required to make permanent improvements upon the land entered before final proof is submitted tending to increase the value of the same for stock-raising purposes, of the value of not less than $1.25 per acre, and at least one-half of such improvements shall be placed upon the land within three years after the date of entry thereof.

"SEC. 4. That any homestead entryman of lands of the character herein described, who has not submitted final proof upon his existing entry, shall have the right to enter, subject to the provisions of this act, such amount of contiguous lands designated for entry under the provisions of this act as shall not, together with the amount embraced in his original entry, exceed 640 acres, and residence upon the original entry shall be credited on both entries, but improvements must be made on the additional entry equal to $1.25 for each acre thereof.

"SEC. 5. That persons who have submitted final proof upon, or received patent for, lands of the character herein described under the homestead laws, and who own and reside upon the land so acquired, may, subject to the provisions of this act, make additional entry for and obtain patent to contiguous lands designated for entry under the provisions of this act, which, together with the area theretofore acquired under the homestead law, shall not exceed 640 acres, on proof of the expenditure required by this act on account of permanent improvements upon the additional entry.

"SEC. 6. That in the event there are not contiguous lands in area sufficient to complete an entry of 640 acres, as provided for in this act, the entryman or patentee shall have the right to enter within a radius of 10 miles from his first entry, subject to the same requirements as specified for contiguous additional entries, lands in reasonably compact form which have been designated for entry under the provisions of this act, that shall, together with the first entry, not exceed 640 acres: Provided, That the entryman shall be required to enter all contiguous areas open to entry prior to the entry of any noncontiguous land.

"SEC. 7. That any person who is the head of a family, or who has arrived at the age of 21 years and is a citizen of the United States, who has entered or acquired under the homestead laws, prior to the passage hereof, lands of the character described in this act, the area of which is less than 640 acres, and who is unable to exercise the right of additional entry herein conferred because no lands subject to entry under this act adjoin the tract so entered or acquired or lie within the 10-mile limit provided for in this act, may, upon submitting proof that he resides upon and has not sold or encumbered the land so entered or acquired, relinquish or reconvey to the United States the land so occupied, entered, or acquired, and in lieu thereof, within the same land-office district, may enter and acquire title to 640 acres of the land subject to entry under this act, but must show compliance with all the provisions of the homestead law and of this act respecting the new entry: Provided, That the lands so relinquished or reconveyed as herein provided shall thereafter be subject to disposition only on such terms and under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

"SEC. 8. That the commutation provisions of the homestead laws shall not apply to any entries made under this act.

"SEC. 9. That any homestead entrymen or patentees who shall be entitled to additional entry under this act shall have, for 30 days after the designation of lands subject to entry under the provisions of this act and contiguous to those entered or owned and occupied by them, the preferential right to make additional entry as provided in this act: Provided, That where such lands contiguous to the lands of two or more entrymen or patentees entitled to additional entries under this section are not sufficient in area to enable such entrymen to secure by additional entry the maximum amounts to which they are entitled, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make an equitable division of the lands among the several entrymen or patentees, applying to exercise preferential rights, such division to be in tracts of not less than 40 acres, and so made as to equalize as nearly as possible the area which such entrymen and patentees will acquire by adding the tracts embraced in additional entries to the lands originally held or owned by them: Provided further, That where but one 40-acre tract of vacant land may adjoin the lands of two or more entrymen or patentees entitled to exercise preferential right hereunder, the tract in question may be entered by the person who first submits to the local land office his application to exercise said preferential right.

"SEC. 10. That any person who has heretofore acquired title to land under any of the homestead laws of the United States and who is the owner and occupant of the land so acquired may purchase from the United States not exceeding 320 acres of stock-raising lands, as designated by this act, or unappropriated and unreserved lands valuable only for grazing contiguous to his said homestead, upon paying to the United States the sum of $1.25 per acre for such lands, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, which said land, together with the area theretofore acquired under the homestead laws, shall not exceed 640 acres.

"SEC. 11. That all entries made and patents issued under the provisions of this act shall be subject to and contain a reservation to the United States of all the coal and other minerals in the lands entered and so patented, together with the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same. The coal and other mineral deposits in such lands shall be subject to disposal by the United States in accordance with the provisions of the coal and mineral lands laws in force at the time of such disposal. Any person qualified to locate and enter the coal or other mineral deposits, or having the right to mine and remove the same under the laws of the United States, shall have the right at all times to enter upon the lands entered or patented, as provided by this act, for the purpose of prospecting for coal or other mineral therein, provided he shall not injure, damage, or destroy the permanent improvements of the entryman or patentee, and shall be liable to and shall compensate the entryman or patentee for all damages to the crops on such lands by reason of such prospecting. Any person who has acquired from the United States the coal or other mineral deposits in any such land, or the right to mine and remove the same, may reenter and occupy so much of the surface thereof as may be required for all purposes reasonably incident to the mining or removal of the coal or other minerals, first, upon securing the written consent or waiver of the homestead entryman or patentee; second, upon payment of the damages to crops or other tangible improvements to the owner thereof, where agreement may be had as to the amount thereof; or, third, in lieu of either of the foregoing provisions, upon the execution of a good and sufficient bond or undertaking to the United States for the use and benefit of the entryman or owner of the land, to secure the payment of such damages to the crops or tangible improvements of the entryman or owner, as may be determined and fixed in an action brought upon the bond or undertaking in a court of competent jurisdiction against the principal and sureties thereon, such bond or undertaking to be in form and in accordance with rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior and to be filed with and approved by the register and receiver of the local land office of the district wherein the land is situate, subject to appeal to the Commissioner of the General Land Office: Provided, That all patents issued for the coal or other mineral deposits herein reserved shall contain appropriate notations declaring them to be subject to the provisions of this act with reference to the disposition, occupancy, and use of the surface of the land.

"SEC. 12. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to make all necessary rules and regulations in harmony with the provisions and purposes of this act for the purpose of carrying the same into effect."

H. R. 15799 has been rereferred by the committee to the Department of the Interior, and there is here inserted the second favorable report, with suggested amendments, of said department upon the general principles embodied in said bill, H. R. 15799:

"DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
"OFFICE OF FIRST ASSISTANT SECRETARY,
"Washington, April 24, 1914.

"Hon. SCOTT FERRIS,
"Chairman Committee on the Public Lands,
"House of Representatives.

"MY DEAR MR. FERRIS: I am in receipt of request for report on H. R. 15799, a bill to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes.

"As stated in my letter to you of January 30, 1914, I am heartily in favor of legislation which will permit and encourage the settlement and development of public lands to which the present homestead laws are not adapted, but which, under a somewhat more liberal measure, would be settled upon, improved, and developed for the purpose of stock raising. I understand that your committee has fully considered all questions of policy as presented in the above-mentioned bill, and that the same is now referred to this department for report with reference only to the administrative features of the bill. With this assumption I beg to submit for your consideration the following:

"1. As a part of section 2 it is provided 'that the Secretary of the Interior shall not designate for entry under this act lands of such character that in his opinion 640 acres will not support a family.' The two negatives used in this proviso would be construed to imply that the Secretary of the Interior shall only designate land of such character that in his opinion 640 acres will support a family. This language practically imposes upon the Government the responsibility of assuring an intending settler that he can support his family upon a designated 640 acres of land. I suggest, therefore, for your consideration in connection with this proviso the following:

"(a) If the proviso were entirely eliminated, the administration of the act would be comparatively simple and inexpensive, and upon the settler alone would be placed the responsibility of ascertaining whether or not 640 acres of land classified under the act would be sufficient for his purposes.

"(b) The classification contemplated by this proviso would involve undue labor and expense.

"If, however, your committee believes some limitation to be essential, I respectfully suggest for your consideration a substitute proviso, as follows:

"'Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior shall not designate for entry under this act land of which, owing to its general character or general conditions, in his opinion, 640 acres clearly will not support a family.'

"2. Line 24, page 4, section 7, requires the entryman described in section 7 to show compliance "with all the provisions of the homestead law and of this act respecting the new entry." Section 3 of the bill requires all entrymen who secure lands under this act to show compliance with the terms of the homestead law, but this is modified by a proviso which permits the making of improvements of a certain character and value in lieu of cultivation. The clause described in line 24 of section 7 would, in my opinion, require an entryman under this act who falls within the purview of section 7 to not only comply with the provisions of this act, but also to cultivate his land to the extent and in the manner prescribed by the general homestead laws. Evidently this is not the intent, and I therefore suggest that the words "of the homestead law and" be stricken from line 24, so that same as amended will read "with all the provisions of this act." As so amended this will make operative and applicable the general homestead laws as modified by the terms of the proviso to section 3.

"Very truly, yours,
A. A. JONES,
"First Assistant Secretary."

The object of H. R. 9582, as well as of the substitute prepared by the Department of the Interior for H. R. 9582, and of H. R. 15799 is to restore and improve the grazing capacity, and therefore the stock-raising and meat-producing capacity, of the semiarid lands of the West, and at the same time to furnish homes thereon to the people.

It appears in the hearings, in the statements of officials of both the Department of the Interior and the Department of Agriculture, that there remain of unappropriated public lands in the semiarid States, exclusive of Indian, forest, military, park, and other reservations, the enormous total, in round numbers, of 330,000,000 acres. It also appears that the area of public lands in said States now included in forest reservations alone amounts, in round numbers, to 165,000,000 acres.

The problem confronting the statesmanship of this day is just as great as that met by the statesmen of that early day when originated the homestead system, ever since adhered to, of making the prime object, in disposing of the public domain, the furnishing of homes for the people.

Two plans for legislating as to the future use or disposal of this semiarid domain were before your committee, the one embodied in H. R. 9582 and the other in H. R. 10539. These bills were heard together and the advocates of each plan fully heard.

The testimony of the advocates of said bills generally agreed upon this proposition, to wit, that free grazing upon the public lands in the semiarid States has depleted the range and reduced the carrying capacity of such lands from one-third to one-half; and both sets of advocates agreed also that further legislation is necessary and needed now to stop further destructive use of such lands and secure for the future their highest use to our civilization.

Looking to this end, H. R. 10539 proposes a system of leasing the remaining public domain of the semiarid States, amounting to about 330,000,000 acres, while H. R. 9582, now H. R. 15799, proposes to accomplish the same end by a system of stock-raising homesteads, giving to each settler a home on such lands with sufficient acreage to support his family by combining forage farming with stock raising.

The hearings establish the fact that on the lands under consideration homesteads of 160 or of 320 acres each are not sufficient to support a family, and that at least 640 acres are necessary to each stock-raising homesteader.

The committee does not hesitate, as far as may be practicable, to adhere to the time-honored plan of using the public domain to furnish homes to the citizens of our country. The fact that the State of Iowa, where 160 acres proved sufficient to support, even to enrich, an industrious citizen, is in the front rank as a producer of agricultural products, and, at the same time, is near the front in the production of beef and mutton and dairy products, shows that farming and stock raising may be successfully combined on the same homestead, and the printed hearings on H. R. 9582 are replete with statements by many citizens of large experience on these semiarid lands that by combining the farming of dry-land forage crops and the raising of cattle or sheep 640 acres will support a family. Mr. I. S. Bartlett, of Cheyenne, Wyo., in his statement beginning at page 316 of the hearings, uses these words:

"A grazing-homestead bill giving 640 acres, or even 2 sections, to each settler would soon add 200 per cent to the live-stock production of the public-land States and solve the beef problem for the next half century. Not only that, it would break down the high prices of beef, pork, and mutton, as well as dairy products.

"Better than all, it would settle up the vast area of waste lands in the Nation with a hardy, intelligent, and progressive American citizenship.

"Think for a moment what our desert or grass ranges will produce, situated, as they are, in an environment of mountains and plains and flooded with sunshine.

"Here are some purely range products: Cattle, sheep, horses, hogs, goats, hides, wool, butter, cheese, milk and dairy products, poultry, and eggs. All these can be produced in our native grass regions without any plowing or land cultivation.

"The irrigated and dry farms in the same section will supplement all the needed fattening and forage crops, and both the farming and stock-raising interests will be mutually and correspondingly benefited.

"The range homestead proposition can be easily worked out. Instead of the requirements of plowing up the land and crop cultivation, the law should require expenditure for sinking wells, the building of sheds and corrals, the possession of a certain number of animals, etc. The residence requirements should be the same as in other homestead acts.

"In nearly every section of the grass ranges water can be found at depths varying from 20 to 500 feet. In many cases artesian water and flowing wells are obtained, giving a sufficient supply of water for irrigating many acres and raising fine crops. With the passage of a grazing homestead bill the so-called desert lands would be penetrated with wells and the whole landscape dotted with windmills and improvements in the form of houses, barns, corrals, and fences.

"In a very few years a wonderful transformation scene would be enacted in the vast cattle ranges of the West, now practically uninhabited by settlers. That this is no dream has already been demonstrated by the results of the Kinkead 640-acre homestead act, which applied to the desert wastes of western Nebraska. That entire section is now settled up with a high class of prosperous and successful farmers. Five million acres of arid lands have been reclaimed there, and the wave of incoming settlers has overflowed into Wyoming in the search for dry-farming lands.

"Even under the late repressive land administration the Commissioner of the General Land Office advocated the 640-acre homestead for the semiarid West, and in so doing stated that 'the largest part of the unappropriated public domain would never pass to private ownership under smaller allotments.'

"Local bills are good enough so far as they go, but the whole subject should be treated from a national point of view and a bill passed applicable to all the States having public lands."

Representative KINKAID, referred to by Mr. BARTLETT, appeared before this committee, and his statement appears in the hearings, beginning at page 334.

This plan of providing homes is best for the Nation, as a whole, because it tends to increase the supply and at the same time to lower the price of meat, a universal necessity, especially to the laboring classes; and because it affords an outlet to the congested civic and labor centers of our population without driving home seekers to take advantage of the liberal land laws of Canada. Moreover, the Nation as a unit needs more States like, for instance, Kansas and Iowa, where each citizen is the sovereign of a portion of the soil, the owner of his home and not tenant of some, perhaps distant, landlord, a builder of schools and churches, a voluntary payer of taxes for the support of his local government.

Of course, the homestead plan is best for the individual States of the semiarid West. It takes homes to insure permanent settlers and taxpayers; it takes homes to bring schools and churches; it takes homes to build cities and towns that attract and support laborers and mechanics; population invites railroads, which in turn bring more immigration and capital to develop the barely touched resources of this great semiarid West.

This subject has been under consideration in previous Congresses. In the Fifty-eighth Congress, third session, a bill creating a 640-acre homestead for a portion of the State of South Dakota was reported favorably (Rept. No. 4013), and from said report we quote from the President's message to Congress at the beginning of the second session of the Fifty-seventh Congress, as follows:

"Moreover, the approaching exhaustion of the public ranges has of late led to much discussion as to the best manner of using these public lands in the West which are suitable chiefly or only for grazing. The sound and steady development of the West depends upon the building up of homes therein. Much of our prosperity as a nation has been due to the operation of the homestead law. On the other hand, we should recognize the fact that in the grazing region the man who corresponds to the homesteader may be unable to settle permanently if only allowed to use the same amount of pasture land that his brother, the homesteader, is allowed to use of arable land. One hundred and sixty acres of fairly rich and well-watered soil, or a much smaller amount of irrigated land, may keep a family in plenty, whereas no one could get a living from 160 acres of dry pasture land capable of supporting at the outside only 1 head of cattle to every 10 acres."

We quote further from the same report, as follows:

"Hon. Charles D. Walcott, present Director of the United States Geological Survey, in a communication to the Secretary of the Interior concerning the Kinkaid bill, which became a law at the last session of this Congress, said in part as follows:

"'The central idea of this bill is that of enlarging the area of homestead entry to suit the conditions of the semiarid West. There is general recognition of the fact that the present land laws, designed for the humid region, are not applicable to the arid region. Attention has been called to this matter many times by various individuals, and in particular by the writings of Maj. J. W. Powell, the former Director of this Survey, who devoted much of his life to the exploration and study of the West. In his report prepared in 1878, entitled "Lands of the Arid Region," Maj. Powell suggests that the farm unit where water is scanty should be not less than 4 square miles, the divisions of such farms being controlled by topographic features.

* * * * * * *

"'The arbitrary limit stated by the present land laws of 160 acres for a homestead does not suit existing conditions in the arid regions. If the water supply is ample, 160 acres is usually far too much, and would support two, three, or four families. On the other hand, throughout 90 to 95 per cent of the vast extent of remaining public land 160 acres is so small as to be useless for a homestead.

"'No general rule as to what shall constitute a homestead can be laid down. In order to determine this matter local knowledge must be had and exercised in the same manner as it is under the reclamation projects. The question is one largely of altitude, climate, and water supply rather than extent of land.

* * * * * * *

"'After cutting out the irrigable lands there are left great areas where it is known that water can not be had in any considerable amount and where the homestead area must be very large to furnish support for a family. In short, it is practicable after eliminating the irrigable land for the Geological Survey, through its organic act and through the Reclamation Service, to classify the remaining public land and obtain information upon which to base the disposal of these lands to actual settlers in tracts sufficient for the support of a family.

"'Under the operation of the present laws the securing of a tract of land large enough to support a family in the arid region is a cumbersome and expensive process. The nucleus of the home farm may be a 160-acre tract, which the law allows as a homestead.

"'All persons admit that this nucleus is only the first step, and that the man who actually desires to make a home there by stock farming must proceed to resort to various expediencies to secure control of additional land in order to support himself. To do this requires either capital to purchase the lands of other homesteaders or the stock farmer must secure some form of title through the desert-land law, timber and stone act, etc. In the majority of cases the practices absolutely necessary to secure an adequate area are open to the charge of fraud or collusion. It should not be necessary for a man desiring a homestead upon vacant public land to resort to indirect or possibly fraudulent means. On the contrary, he should be allowed and encouraged to take up as much land as he actually needs and be given every facility for so doing.

"'The development of the arid West has reached a point where it is now possible to see the ultimate character of settlement and utilization of the land. Where, as above stated, water can be had, the irrigable lands may be cultivated in the most intensive fashion. With favorable climatic conditions several crops a year will be raised, and a 40-acre farm will more than furnish support for a family. The average size of an irrigated farm in Utah is, for example, less than 30 acres.

"'Assuming that there are 600,000,000 acres in the arid and semiarid West, not to exceed 10 per cent of this, or 60,000,000 acres, will be utilized for irrigation. Most of the remainder is useful for stock-raising purposes, a portion being devoted to forest reserves, within which grazing may be largely permitted. In round numbers, 500,000,000 acres of land will have its highest use in the raising of cattle and sheep. Most of this is still in public ownership, and it is for the interest of the Nation to have the land subdivided into the smallest tracts which will support a family and have these pass gradually into private ownership, so that the land may in time bear its share of taxation.'"

A BRIEF REVIEW OF THE BILL BY SECTIONS.

The reasons for sections 1 and 2 of the bill hereby reported are obvious from the reading of them.

Section 3 contains a change in the proviso thereof in existing homestead laws, in that under this bill, H. R. 15799, in lieu of cultivation of a portion of his entry the entryman is required to make permanent improvements upon the land entered tending to increase the value of the same for stock-raising purposes, of the value of not less than $1.25 per acre, one-half of such improvements to be made within three years after the date of entry.

The object of the law-making power in requiring a certain amount of cultivation of the land by the entryman in homestead laws when farming was the prime object was, first, to insure good faith on the part of the entryman; and, second, to require the entryman to show that good faith by doing something, at his own expense, of value to the land, tending to improve it for farming purposes. Moreover, the statements in the hearings show that the efforts of entrymen under the 320-acre homestead law to comply with the requirements as to plowing a certain number of acres each year simply destroyed so much valuable sod by turning it up to the sun and killing the roots of the native grasses. So under section 3 the entryman may show his good faith by improving his land by sinking wells, building fences, silos, and such things as will improve his entry for stock-raising purposes.

Section 4: This section is for the relief and equitable treatment of entrymen who entered homesteads under the 160 and 320 acre homestead acts upon lands chiefly valuable for grazing, and who afterwards found, by costly experience, that farming was impossible on small tracts of such lands. The hearings show that many of them have held on and eked out their existence by grazing a few head of stock on the unentered public lands near enough for grazing purposes to their respective small homesteads. But upon the enactment of a 640-acre homestead law such near-by public lands will soon be taken up by other entrymen of 640-acre tracts. Thus the already empoverished pioneer would be condemned to final extinction, as he could not live by farming, and would be deprived of the use of public lands for grazing. Section 4 therefore provides that entrymen of tracts of 320 acres or less on lands subsequently made subject to the 640-acre homestead, who have not submitted final proof upon their said prior entries, shall have the right to enter upon other such lands of like character contiguous to their said prior entries as shall not exceed, together with their said prior entries, 640 acres in each case; but residence upon the original entry shall be credited upon both entries, and the expenditure of $1.25 per acre must be made on the additional entry in each case.

Section 5: While section 4, just explained, relates to entrymen who have not submitted final proof on such prior entry, section 5 extends the same right of contiguous entry, up to a total of 640 acres, to such entrymen as have submitted final proof or received patent on such original entries, but the expenditure for permanent improvements must be made upon the additional entries.

Section 6: While sections 4 and 5, just described, relate only to lands contiguous to the original entry, section 6 is for the relief of such entrymen on lands of the character herein described, in tracts of 320 acres or less, as have entries entirely surrounded by other entries, and contiguous to whose respective entries, therefore, no public lands are to be found subject to entry. For the relief of such entrymen, therefore, any entryman of lands of the character herein described is given the right in section 6 to make an additional entry of sufficient land to make, with the amount of his original entry or patent, 640 acres, within 10 miles of his said original entry. This is subject, however, to the same requirements as other additional entries, and the entryman must exhaust all contiguous land subject to additional entry before availing himself of noncontiguous land.

Section 7: This section is proposed for the relief of such entrymen of the lands of the character herein described, in amounts of 320 acres or less, as are unable to exercise the right of additional entry herein conferred, because no lands subject to entry under this bill are contiguous to his said original entry or lie within the 10-mile limit of his original entry. If such entryman is the head of a family or 21 years of age and a citizen of the United States, and first submits proof that he resides upon and has not sold or encumbered the land as occupied, entered, or acquired, he may relinquish or reconvey to the United States the land so entered, occupied, or acquired, and in lieu thereof, within the same land-office district, he may enter and acquire 640 acres of land subject to entry under this bill; and he must also show compliance with all the provisions of the homestead laws and of this bill, as if an original entryman under this act, provided that the lands so relinquished or reconveyed, as herein provided, shall thereafter be subject to disposition by the United States only on such terms and under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe. This proviso is intended to serve a double purpose—to prevent speculation in relinquishments and to empower the Secretary of the Interior to see that justice is done the prior owner in the matter of any improvements on the relinquished land that the prior owner may have left on his said original entry.

Section 8: This section forbids the application of the commutation provision of the homestead laws to entries under this act.

Section 9: This section gives a preference right of 30 days to a prior entryman to enter lands contiguous to his said original entry, with a provision for an equitable apportionment of contiguous lands between two or more prior entrymen who may each desire to enter the same lands as contiguous to their respective prior entries.

Section 10: This section extends the right of an entryman under any existing homestead law to acquire, by direct purchase from the Government, at the rate of $1.25 per acre, public land of the character herein described, contiguous to his original entry, in amount sufficient to make, with his original entry, not more than 640 acres. It appeared to your committee that many homesteaders have entered small tracts of land, even as small tracts as 40 acres each, in the canyons in mountainous districts, surrounding small springs of water sufficient to water a few head of stock and perhaps irrigate gardens in the bed of the canyon, and have used the public lands and mountain slopes adjoining for grazing purposes. Your committee would allow such small stockman to supplement his original entry by purchase, as set out in section 10, but only of contiguous lands of the character herein described, and under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

Section 11: It appeared to your committee that many hundreds of thousands of acres of the lands of the character designated under this bill contain coal and other minerals, the surface of which is valuable for stock-raising purposes. The purpose of section 11 is to limit the operation of this bill strictly to the surface of the lands described and to reserve to the United States the ownership and right to dispose of all minerals underlying the surface thereof. This section also provides a method for joint use of the surface of the land by the entryman of the surface thereof and the person who shall acquire from the United States the right to prospect, enter, extract, and remove all minerals that may underlie such lands, this method to be under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe.

A. J. G. KANE.

Mr. O'GORMAN. In the second session of the Sixty-second Congress I introduced a bill, being Senate bill 5497, for the relief of A. J. G. Kane, and which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I find that the relief sought can be procured in another way, and I ask for the adoption of the following order:

The order was read and agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That the papers in the case of A. J. G. Kane, Senate 5497, Sixty-second Congress, second session, be withdrawn from the Senate files, no adverse report having been made thereon.

NOTE FROM THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT.

Mr. LODGE. I submit a resolution, for which I ask present consideration. I will state, by way of explanation, that the document I am asking for was partially printed in the press this morning. It has been given in full to the press, and I think we ought to have a copy of it here.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 548) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to send to the Senate the note received from the British Government dated February 10, 1915.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. STONE. What is the resolution, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has just been read.

Mr. LODGE. It is a request to have sent to the Senate a copy of the note from the British Government which was published in the papers this morning. It was given in full at the State Department in print to the newspaper press, which has partially printed it. I think we would all like to have a full copy of it.

Mr. STONE. I should like to have the resolution read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. LODGE. That is the note printed in part in the Post this morning.

Mr. STONE. Yes; I saw that.

Mr. LODGE. And it was given in full in print to the newspapers—in type. They have offered to furnish Senators with that copy, and I do not see why the Senate should not have it.

Mr. STONE. Although one or two Senators have suggested that the resolution should be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, I am very frank to say, so far as I am concerned, that personally I do not see any objection to agreeing to it. I make no objection, so far as I am concerned.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

WAGES ON AMERICAN VESSELS.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, perhaps I ought to have submitted the matter I am about to submit under another order, but on yesterday I presented some replies from steamship companies as to the rate of wages paid on the ships that came under the new registry. I desire to submit a letter from Barber & Co., steamship agents, of New York, and ask that the first part of it be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

NEW YORK, February 17, 1915.

Hon. J. H. GALLINGER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We acknowledge receipt of yours of February 10 inquiring as to whether foreign-built ships which have been admitted to American register cost more to operate than under the British flag, and in reply would advise you that as far as we know the only increase at the present time in operating expenses under the American flag is on account of the increase in wages.

The following is a list of wages that was paid to a lascar crew, with British officers in command, also showing the wages which we pay to the officers and men under the American register:

Crew.	American, per month.	British, per month.
Master	$200.00	$160.00
Chief officer	100.00	78.00
Second officer	70.00	54.00
Third officer	60.00	44.00
Carpenter	40.00	20.00
Boatswain	40.00	17.00
Sailors	28.00	8.00
Chief engineer	150.00	112.00
First refrigerating engineer	110.00	.....
First assistant engineer	100.00	73.00
Second assistant engineer	90.00	49.00
Second refrigerating engineer	85.00	.....
Third assistant engineer	80.00	39.00
Oilers	35.00	.....
Donkeymen	35.00	11.50
Firemen	32.00	9.25
Coal passers	28.00	.....
Chief steward	50.00	22.68
Second steward	30.00	9.63
Assistant steward	22.00	.....
Chief cook	50.00	[1]17.00
Second cook	30.00	8.50
Mess boy	25.00	.....

[1] And bonus $10

Yours, truly, BARBER & CO. (INC.).

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I have here a clipping from the Philadelphia Public Ledger of February 18 which reads in this way:

SHORTAGE OF SHIPS SENDS WATER RATES TO NEW HIGH MARK—AMERICAN BUSINESS OPPORTUNITIES AFFECTED BY LACK OF VESSELS AND EXORBITANT TARIFFS.

Business opportunities are being lost to America because of the scarcity of vessels, said several steamship men yesterday. According to these men there is the greatest shortage of tonnage ever known, and the only reason that there is not a congestion at this port is because shippers in the interior are not forwarding their goods for shipment until they have obtained cargo space. Most of the regular lines, it was said yesterday, have all of their vessels booked up until the last of March, and many of them into the middle of April.

Although many of them admitted that they were turning down business because of the lack of vessels, some were opposed to the ship-purchase bill. Walter F. Hagar, one of the best-informed shipping men in this city, said that there was such a lack of vessels that it was impossible to get steamships.

According to Mr Hagar, shippers are compelled to charter schooners at exorbitant rates because of the lack of steamships. Some schooners, he asserted, had been chartered to carry ore at high rates, a thing almost unheard of in recent years. "Usually boats are offering for freights, but now the case is reversed and it is impossible to get carriers," he continued. Mr. Hagar declared that 15s. had recently been paid for a grain cargo to Denmark, which is the highest rate ever paid for freight of that class.

Shipping men realize the gravity of the situation, he said, and that one vessel had recently been chartered as far ahead as March 1, 1916, for a period of 18 months at 8s., which is about twice as high as the rate that was being paid six months ago. He also said that the steamship Thelma had recently been chartered to carry sugar at 32 cents. Six months ago this vessel was carrying sugar at 8½ cents, or about one-fourth of the present rate.

ADDRESS BY SECRETARY M'ADOO (S. DOC. NO. 950).

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask to have printed as a public document the address of Secretary McAdoo before the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, heretofore printed in the RECORD of February 16, in which form it is not available for public distribution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR BURTON (S. DOC. NO. 949).

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, we have been very liberal in publishing the utterances of Secretary McAdoo. They have gone into the RECORD, and we now propose to print one of his addresses as a public document. I ask unanimous consent that the address of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] delivered before the Chamber of Commerce of the United States be likewise printed in the RECORD and also as a public document.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have no objection to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Hampshire? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

The address is as follows:

THE OPPOSITION AND THE SHIPPING BILL.

[Address by Hon. THEODORE E. BURTON, United States Senator from Ohio.]

"I congratulate you on your organization and its aims. Ten years ago I addressed a somewhat similar gathering, intended to be national in its scope, and foretold for them a field of usefulness far and away beyond that of any local organization. This body represents the United States. No pent-up Utica restrains your activities, but a whole boundless continent is yours, and in the ramifications of your work you seek to put Paris and Berlin and London and Hongkong on the map alongside of New York and Chicago. I trust that you may succeed in enlarging the trade of the United States and that your aims in every line, commercially and industrially, may also join with civic activities in which you will give a wholesome stimulus to our political life; for in this age no man can be a business man alone; he must keep in touch with the great movements of humanity which are so powerful in this day.

"First of all, is this policy to be permanent or is it to be temporary? If it is to be temporary, one set of reasons would apply. If it is to be permanent, an entirely different set of questions are raised. I want to read very briefly some of the varying statements on that subject.

"In the report filed by the chairman of the House committee, Mr. ALEXANDER, is this language:

"While we need merchant ships to meet the present emergency, let us pursue a policy that will secure them to us after the present conflict in Europe is past.

"In an address at Boston on the 5th of January he said:

"The Government ownership bill is spoken of as an emergency measure. It should not be so called. European Governments have in the past laid the foundation for their merchant marine by Government protection.

THE FLETCHER BILL.

"I might read divers other expressions to the same effect. Now let us listen to a different note. Senator FLETCHER in bringing forward this bill in the United States Senate on the 4th of January, one day before the speech from which I have read an extract, said:

"Without going further into the details of this bill, I assure the Senate in the first place, and the country, that it is not a permanent business undertaking on the part of the Government that is intended here.

"And the language of the President, as used in his message in December, would seem to point in the same direction:

"It is not a question of the Government monopolizing the field. It should take action to make it certain that transportation at reasonable rates will be promptly provided, even where the carriage is not at first profitable, and then when the carriage has become sufficiently profitable to attract and engage private capital and engage it in abundance, the Government ought to withdraw.

"Now, there you have those two sides. Which are we to take as authoritative? There has not only been a change from December to January, but apparently a change from Monday to Wednesday, or rather from Tuesday to Wednesday; for upon the Hill on Tuesday a coterie of those favoring the measure were seeking to conciliate seven of their colleagues by promising them the minimum of Government ownership, agreeing to limit the operation of the bill to a year or two and to provide for leasing the ships to private operators; while on Wednesday morning, after failing in their first endeavor, they were promising another group to embark the Government on a permanent policy of Government ownership. Apparently the proponents of this measure have utterly lost the bearings of their traditional statecraft and are ready to plead an emergency or fly to socialist doctrine, whichever will win the votes.

OPERATING AT PROFIT OR LOSS.

"Again, is this to be an enterprise for profit or not for profit? Is it supposed that by running at a loss for a period, in some mysterious way the business would become profitable, as implied in the President's message, and the Government then be able and willing to turn it over to private hands? Of course, such a supposition is without any foundation in reason. The sure result of the Government operating merchant ships at a loss would be the complete demoralization of the shipping trade, the destruction of such merchant marine as we now have, and a long postponement of the day of its revival.

"Again, there has been another change, this time in the purpose to be accomplished. When this measure was brought forward in August, and when it was advocated in December, it seemed that what was under consideration was trade development with South and Central America. New avenues of trade—"empty markets," to use the expression of the President—"were the objects in view." Nothing was said about the settled countries of Europe. Now there is an entire change and the advocacy of the bill is based upon the necessity of sending freight to Europe. The idea that we need more shipping for South America at this time, although it was the first reason for the passage of this bill, although for months that was exploited as a reason why the Government should engage in the business, is a chimera.

THE SOUTH AMERICAN TRADE.

"Ten boats leave every month on the average from New York for Rio de Janeiro and the east coast of South America. What are the facts? Before and since the war they have been running with a surplus of cargo space, sometimes being only half filled. A few weeks ago a passenger boat fit to engage in the trans-Atlantic trade came in from Rio with 6 first-class passengers and 17 third-class passengers, and that was the whole passenger list. On the west coast of South America, notwithstanding the stimulus afforded by the opening of the Panama Canal, the Peruvian and the Chilian navigation companies, which jointly ran boats weekly, have withdrawn the weekly service and made it fortnightly. I trust that the old conditions are soon to be restored.

"Here I want to call attention to one phase of this whole freight situation. While there may be sporadic instances of high rates to those portions of the world that are at peace, there has not been a rise in the charges so great as that which has frequently happened in the times of profound peace. Generally speaking, the rates to South America, to South Africa, to India, and to Hongkong have been raised about 25 per cent. In sporadic instances rates in the war zone have been raised eight or nine times. Thus the disparity in the increases is the substance of the whole matter, and shows conclusively that the increases are in direct proportion to the dangers of war.

AN INTERNATIONAL WAR CRISIS.

"I am sorry to say that there are a great many people in the United States who do not seem to realize that we are in the midst of the most titanic conflict between nations that the world has ever seen. We should have a deep realization of what it means. Happily we here in America are at peace. The sun shines over peaceful fields and witnesses people joyous because they are not engaged in war. Heaven be thanked for the blessing that belongs to us, and woe to the man who would stir up strife or interfere with that neutrality, that strict impartiality, which the American people should maintain at this time.

"I may have sympathies. I may think one nation or the other is more to blame, but I do not tell anybody; and I do not think anyone who has in the remotest degree any official responsibility should do so. We should not at this time allow fondness for the enlargement of trade—a disposition with which I sympathize—to erase from our minds a realization of what this war means and of the duty of the American people. The brightest page in it all is the work of this whole Nation for the suffering of Europe, the activities of the Red Cross Society, the great foundation in New York, and the universal response of the American people in sending food and supplies to the suffering and dying of Europe. When the contest is over this will be our chief distinction, rather than sending war material or capturing trade.

"I want you to realize this fact: There is war, and this war has deranged the routes of trade. It has destroyed many of the agencies of transportation. It has diminished shipping facilities. It has introduced demoralization, partial destruction in almost every branch of commercial and industrial activity. Do not ignore that fact, and do not treat this question as if it were one to be settled as if we were now at peace.

A NONPARTISAN QUESTION.

"I agree with the honorable Secretary of the Treasury that this matter should be considered as a nonpartisan one. I took that stand in the first remarks made in the Senate some days ago which undoubtedly were much longer than any remarks I shall make to you to-day. Last Monday, when I saw seven Democrats, in the face of objurgation and censure, stand up and vote to recommit this shipping bill to the committee—which meant its defeat—I thought it was beginning to assume a nonpartisan phase in the Congress.

"Will the conditions of European trade be relieved by increased shipping? Do not let us deal with generalities. Let us get down to the facts. What is it that has caused this decrease in the supply of shipping and an increase in freight rates? In the first place, German and Austrian shipping is withdrawn from the seas. Those boats probably carried about 14 per cent of the foreign trade. But let us consider that for a moment. If German and Austrian shipping is withdrawn from the seas, so also are Germany and Austria shut off from the trade of the world. The Baltic Sea is practically closed to trade; so also is the Black Sea. And, roughly approximating an estimate, we may say that the trade of the world has decreased because of the war in just about a like proportion with the loss of shipping. The situation would naturally call for an increase of our exports—more food and more supplies. More food and more supplies are destroyed when war is in progress. This tendency is emphasized by the desire of the nations, as Italy and Sweden and Norway, near to the theater of war, but not engaged in the conflict, to prepare themselves for all exigencies. That has increased the measure of their purchases. All factors considered, the withdrawal of this German shipping is no doubt a factor in the increase of freight rates.

WAR-RISK INSURANCE.

"Another factor of great importance is the liability of boats to search and seizure. Still more important is the cost of war-risk insurance. Even if it be only 2 or 3 per cent for a voyage, just think what that means. Suppose there are half a dozen voyages in the year; 12 or 18 per cent must be paid for war-risk insurance. That would be far and away beyond the ordinary income on investments of capital. Another reason is the dangerous channels through which shipping may go. If there is any one thing that the mariner fears more than others it is a hidden obstruction. He fears that his boat may run upon the rocks. But infinitely more dangerous is the mine which, when it explodes, not only stops the vessel and blows up the hull, but perhaps carries captain and crew and all into kingdom come. Then there is another reason. The requisition, especially by Great Britain, of a good share of its shipping to be used for military purposes.

"But when I name all these I have not named that which is at present the most decisive in the situation—that is, the delay in foreign ports.

FOREIGN PORTS CONGESTED.

"As a man said a few days ago—and I am not sure but that he was pretty nearly right—more ships would add to the congestion, for they would be in each other's way in foreign ports. Let me give you a few illustrations. Not very long ago an American boat was chartered to carry horses to a port in France. It had additional cargo capacity of 8,000 tons dead weight, but the owners learned that in the port to which they were going there had been a delay of 60 days in loading and unloading. What did they do? They went from this country to France without filling a foot of the space rather than to take the risk of delay and detention. Delay and detention are not limited to the ports of countries at war. It is just as bad at Genoa as anywhere, where a few days ago 30 ships were waiting in vain to be unloaded. It is a marked factor at Liverpool and at London—perhaps not so large in the German ports, if you can reach them, but generally in all European ports—and the cause of it is perfectly obvious. Government ships and other ships gather in the harbor. The Government claims for its military purpose the first use of quays and docks. The men who would be engaged in loading and unloading have gone to the war. The men who would be making necessary repairs have gone to the war, and thus it is necessary to wait 20 or 30 or 40 or 60 days before a boat can be unloaded.

"On this subject I want to read very briefly from a report by Norman Hill, made on the 12th of January last. I think there is no one who is a higher authority in England in regard to shipping. He says:

"There is nothing in any of the above figures to account for the congestion of the ports in which fewer vessels have been available, and there has probably been as great a fall in the volume of the trade carried. The tonnage remaining available has been sufficient to carry the cargoes offering, for cargoes have not had to be shut out; although in the trade of the United Kingdom the amount carried in each of our ships has not substantially increased, the time employed in the discharge has increased most seriously. In London and Liverpool vessels have to wait for days for discharging berths, and when they can obtain berths the discharge is hampered and delayed by the block on the quays and on the railways. It is clear, therefore, that the causes of the congestion must be other than the one of ships or the one of quay space. The main cause is beyond question the shortage of labor.

"And that applies in an even greater degree in the countries more affected by the war than Great Britain, where, in a degree, industrial and commercial activities have gone on as heretofore.

"Where are you going to get your ships? My good friend Mr. Baker, who has been quoted by the distinguished Secretary of the Treasury, says that there are not more than 10 ships available under neutral flags that would be suitable for the purpose, and he advises the building of ships. Well, it is a "present emergency" that is on us. We all fervently hope that this war will close in a less time than ships could be built. Strangely, most of our shipyards are busy already, and it would be 10 to 16 months before a boat of any considerable size, suitable for the trans-Atlantic trade, could be built in one of our shipyards. In the meantime you have those 10 ships. What are you going to do with them? How much will they help you? What better would the Government do with those 10 ships than the private owners are doing? Is the Government, which we must concede is sometimes very unwieldy, going to manage the shipping business better than the private owners?

GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP.

"There are three phases of Government ownership presented in this proposal. I am not one of those for whom Government ownership has the terror that it has for many. Under proper restrictions it does not frighten me. But what is the proper field for Government ownership? It is in some branch of public service monopolistic in its nature, like waterworks in a city, electric light or gas plants—possibly telephone service and street railways, or those activities that are in close association with the moral and social conditions of a country, such as bathhouses or lodging houses. Here you are proposing partial Government ownership, though there is nothing more disastrous than to have part Government and part private ownership. This is not a fair test of Government ownership and operation. The ships that could be purchased with forty millions would be a mere bagatelle in the shipping of the world. You would be at best, even if it were half, in about the same condition that you are in when there are two telephone lines in the city. Oh, I have been through that! I have heard the statement made, 'You have one telephone line here. If you put in another you will have the benefit of competition.' What was the result? Each telephone line has to wire every building, put separate conduits in every street, and each office must have two phones. There is inconvenience all along the line, and finally either there will be insufficient service or the public will have to pay interest on both equipments.

"I remember some 30 years ago that there was a new railroad projected paralleling the Lake Shore Railroad between Buffalo and Cleveland. You could flip a copper between the different tracks much of the way. The right-of-way man went out and said, 'Now, farmer, we are going to have a competing line here. You can go to town more cheaply; you can ship your produce more cheaply; you will have all the blessings of competition; and a new avenue to happiness will be opened to you.' In about three years they were both under the same management. It proved impossible to run the two side by side under the laws of competition.

"What are you going to do if you have only one-fourteenth or one-twentieth of the shipping of the world? In the first place, the question has been asked, Have you any special route on which you will put these boats? And the answer is made, No; we will cross that bridge when we come to it. I think that question ought to be answered. I do not think Congress should be asked to appropriate forty or fifty millions of dollars without knowing something about what is to be done with the money.

PORTS OF CALL.

"Will special ports be selected? Then what happens? If you choose Galveston, will not Mobile and New Orleans have occasion to complain? Will you choose a special product, such as wheat or cotton? Then, will not every other class of producers have a right to complain that you are giving a special advantage to this line of business to the disadvantage of every other? Suppose the Government carries at lower freight rates than private owners; what would be the result? Why, perhaps one-twentieth of the traffic of this country—a fraction certainly not greater than one-tenth—would be carried at a lower rate. What is the result? Does the great body of the American people get the benefit of it? No; it is the few who are benefited by those rates. It is exactly like the days of railroad wars, when the railroads in times of sharp competition put down their rates to a low figure. Those who were on the ground floor and took advantage of it were able to get their stuff carried at low figures, and they put the benefits in their pockets. The consumer got no benefit from it. You can not go into this business partially and make a success of it. If you are going into Government ownership, it is necessary that you shall control the whole business. There is no middle ground.

"I recognize a disposition on the part of many of the American people to disparage expert knowledge. It is thought that inexperienced men may gather around a table and smoke cigars and make plans and advise organizations for trade or industry just as well as those who have given their lives to it. A distinguished public man went out to Trenton not long ago to address a high school, and he said that the youth who has written a bright epigram gains more éclat than the student who has studied for two years. I want to say a few words for the student that studies for two years and who masters the subject. It appears sometimes to be imagined that great inventions and discoveries are the result of a chance inspiration; that a man, peering out into the outer void, puts his hand out and brings in a telephone or an electric light. But, ladies and gentlemen, that is not the case. The rewards in business and in science come to those who labor and who acquire qualifications.

SHIPPING TRADE NECESSITIES.

"Thus the shipping trade has been developing for centuries. It has adopted new routes of trade; it has adopted new methods; it has preceded rather than followed demands. There are certain necessities in regard to it. There must be terminals for the loading and discharge of freight. It is not sufficient to have ships. There must be wharves and quays. Is the Government going to secure those also? There must be affiliations with shippers. Is the Government going to secure such in a month or in two months? There must be a familiarity with the routes of commerce; a most careful calculation must be made so that the ship will have not only an outgoing but a return cargo; that she shall have something to do the year around. And then again oftentimes the owner of the ship is a merchant. He has a cargo one way supplied by some shipper. He buys something to bring back. That is in a considerable degree true of the trade on the west coast of South America, where nitrates constitute the return cargo. Is the Government going into that business and going to buy merchandise to carry at this time? I must say that in whatever phase we consider this bill we meet with difficulties. Not only is partial Government ownership defective in any field, but this is a line of business which it would be particularly dangerous for a newcomer to enter under the most favorable circumstances.

"The Revenue-Cutter Service, referred to by the distinguished Secretary, I commend very much, but it discharges a purely governmental function in the first place, and to that has been added the most commendable object of saving life. But that was not a creation overnight. That was not adopted under a bill never declared for in a party platform. It is the growth of a hundred years. I read a report by one of the Cabinet officers a few days ago about the frightfully dilapidated condition of the boats in one branch of the Government service, and I thought, 'Is it possible that alongside such a condition as this under Government management we are going to be asked that the Government go into the shipping business on a large scale?' If the Government can not manage boats that are used for its own agencies, how is it going to manage them when they are used for the general purposes of trade?

PURCHASE OF BELLIGERENT SHIPS.

"There is one question I must consider before I close: Are you going to buy ships of any of the belligerent nations? It would take too long for me to go into this question in detail, but I wish to state the situation briefly: Formerly England maintained the idea that a neutral could buy the ship of a belligerent in time of war if it was done in good faith. The doctrine on the Continent of Europe was always the contrary; that a purchase by a neutral of a belligerent ship in time of war was void, and that if she sailed with the neutral flag she could be seized, taken into the prize court, and condemned. In the declaration of London, formulated by a convention in London in 1909, all the commercial nations practically agreed with the continental doctrine; that is, a transfer before the beginning of war was valid if made in good faith, but if made after war had commenced it was void unless it was shown that it was not done to evade the consequences of war. Suppose there is a merchant ship of Germany or England in the harbor of Charleston or Galveston. What are the 'consequences' to which such a boat is exposed? Why, if it sailed out under the German or English flag it would be seized by the other of the belligerents. If transferred to the American flag, it would be to evade the consequences of war, and the boat would still be subject to seizure. This war is not going to last always. We must take into account the feeling of these foreign nations toward us when the war has finished. I am afraid we have been a little too commercial in many of our ideals.

"Germany has issued a statement confirming the declaration of London. It is true she has intimated that she might waive her objections to the sale of certain boats detained in our harbors if the boats sail exclusively to German ports, and saying that such boats must have a passport issued by the German consul and that it must be taken to the State Department for approval, and then it is good for only one trip. England and France have also proclaimed the declaration of London, with some modification, as their policy during the war.

OUR NATIONAL RIGHTS.

"With these belligerents all united in the idea that ships can not be transferred under these circumstances, I want to say that we can not afford to take the chance. I am not one of those who say with bluff old Commodore Hull, 'My country: May she be always in the right; but, right or wrong, my country.' I can not agree with the last clause. No nation has insisted upon the rights of belligerents more earnestly than we did in the Civil War. We took it upon ourselves to determine the ultimate destination of cargoes; that is, if a boat sailed for Nassau and her cargo was suspiciously large, we reserved the right to investigate the question as to whether the goods were not intended to run the blockade. If a boat went to Matamoras, even though Mexico was at war, and the owners said, 'This may be intended for Mexico,' our prize court said, 'No; the chances are that it is intended for our enemies, and we will confiscate your boat and its cargo.'

"We can not afford to take the chance of trouble in buying belligerent ships. Thus we are driven back on the 10 ships that are available.

TERMS OF PROPOSED BILL.

"I am compelled to differ with some things that have been stated to-day in regard to this being in reality a private enterprise. Instead of buying the boats directly the Government is to organize a corporation, 51 per cent of the stock of which is to be paid directly from the Government Treasury; and if the remaining 49 per cent is not taken by private subscription, then the Government takes that also. The Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Commerce exercise certain supervision over this corporation, with three others, who constitute a shipping board. The very statement of my honored friend, the Secretary of the Treasury, in which he said the President is to have control of all this, and made an appeal to you, in which I most cordially join, of confidence in the President of the United States, disproves its private character; for, whatever difference I may have with him, I honor him as a man, and he is our President. But you are asked to favor this bill because the President is going to control it all. How is that consistent with private business of a private corporation? The fact of the matter is that this corporation is a mere mask. Every dollar of the stock, no doubt, would be subscribed by the Federal Government. It is a Federal enterprise. The corporate form is a mere cloak to cover the real nature of the transaction; not intentionally so, but in effect. I may weary you perhaps by dealing in the distinction between the rights and obligations of a government and of a citizen in relation to belligerents. A citizen can ship munitions of war to a belligerent, and the Government is not compelled to intervene. The citizen must take his chance. If the boat is caught, he loses that which is contraband; but the moment the Government of the United States does a thing of that kind it is an act of hostility, leading to the most serious complications. You can not get out of that situation by passing a bill of this kind and going through this fiction of organizing a corporation of the District of Columbia.

DANGER OF SEIZURE.

"I should tremble with apprehension, if this corporation should be organized, and a boat owned by it, under the direction of the Government, or as Secretary McAdoo has said, under the general direction of the President of the United States, should go out to sea and be seized by England or Germany on the ground that the cargo was contraband or that the ship had been transferred to our flag by a belligerent in time of war. I do not want such a bone of contention, such a source of friction and quarrel brought into our international relations at this time when everything is so tense and we must maintain neutrality and equal friendship for all. But suppose it were possible to obtain boats from neutrals, no doubt at a very high price, what advantageous use could we make of them? I dwell upon that subject again at the risk of repetition.

GOVERNMENT BOARD QUESTIONS.

"Do you believe that a Government board entering into this business without affiliation with shippers, without wharves and docks, can utilize those boats and carry any more freight on them than the private citizen who has made it a business all his life? You say private owners are charging extortionate prices. I think they are high, and I will join in any reasonable measure that will submit charges to supervision and control. You can not go as far as you can in the control of the railroad rate, because the business is vitally different, but you can at least supervise conference agreements. Why, it is said that there is a Shipping Trust. If ever there was an old and decayed derelict ready to be blown up, it is the Shipping Trust.

IF THE GOVERNMENT GOES INTO BUSINESS.

"Just at this time I must most vigorously dissent, if the Secretary will excuse me, from something that he said at Chicago—he did not quite say it here. I read from his Chicago speech:

"The objection that the shipping bill puts the Government in the shipping business, is not tenable. Those who urge it seem to forget that it is the duty of the Government to engage in any activities, even of a business nature, which are demanded in the interest of all the country when it is possible to engage private capital in such operations.

"Where will you stop upon that kind of a platform? Whenever there is a political agitation against some line of business, whether it is buying ships or marketing wheat, the Government has got to go into the business. The crowning glory of American life has been the initiative, the energy, the opportunity of the individual. I join with old Thomas Jefferson when he said 'that government is best which governs least.' I do not want to see the Government taking over business enterprises, and selecting men who are to manage them more or less according to political favor. There is too great a multitude that has come here already seeking office; going first to high-grade hotels, then to cheap boarding houses, and then going home despondent. If the Government goes into business, I am afraid they will take the first train and come back again and say, 'While we may not have succeeded very well in the business in which we have been engaged at home, it is only because we did not have opportunity to carry on operations on a large enough scale. Just put us in the Government service, and we will make a success in any position in which you place us, and in that way you will reward us for the services conferred in the campaign.'

"This is a situation true in a large degree with Democrats, and in some degree with the Republicans. I am not criticizing any political party, but I want to say to this audience that we will never have efficient Government management, certainly Government ownership, until the wide shield of the civil service and appointment in regard to merit rests over all our governmental activities.

OBJECT OF BILL.

"This bill, should it facilitate export, would certainly raise prices. I have heard in a political campaign that it was a requisite of usefulness that men should go their round with different speeches in their pockets—one for use when they went among the farmers telling them, 'You are going to have higher prices and everything is going to go better if you put us into office;' and then they would go into cities and say, 'You are paying too much for bread, and the prices are going to be lower.'

"Now, what is the object of this bill? Is it to raise prices? Why, wheat is quoted at a figure higher than it has been, save in some sudden rushes in the market, since the year 1866. Persons are coming here to Washington asking that an embargo be placed on the export of wheat and wheat products. There was a headline in one of the papers night before last that said the cost to the Capital City alone would be $600,000 because of the added price of wheat. It has got to be either a smaller loaf or a higher price. The Government ought at least to be neutral under those circumstances. Is it going to use its strong hand? Is it going to tax the people, consumer and producer alike, to facilitate the export of wheat and hence raise the price of our primary food product?

"Now, let us look into the cotton situation for a minute. We have an unprecedented crop this year—16,000,000 bales. Very early in this war the Liverpool cotton exchange passed a resolution that they would not buy any cotton at present; the sources of demand were shut off; the cotton textile industry is demoralized by the war. There is consequently a very much diminished demand. Is it not perfectly inevitable that the price should be lowered under those circumstances, namely, the large crop and the diminished demand abroad? In this terrible war the consumer pays the freight as he never did before. If wheat were available from Odessa, if it were available from Siberia, if it were available from India, there would be competition, but, as it is now, the main source of supply is the New World. You can fix the price in Chicago or in Buenos Aires and add on the freight, and the consumer abroad has got to pay the freight. In Bremen the cost of cotton is 19 cents. Why is it so? Because of the high rate of freight between Galveston or Savannah or New Orleans, and the danger of capture, the danger of detention, and the danger of being blown into eternity by mines when you are on the way.

CONSIDERATION FOR THE CONSUMER.

"Why, it was rather understood when this new régime commenced that we were to have lower prices. That was one of the promises that were made. Now, is it to be the sole aim of governmental activity to raise prices? Is not the consumer entitled to the considerate attention of the administration? Will you tax the consumer and the producer alike to help the producer alone? Is that the new governmental idea that you are going to bring into effect?

"Now, there is one point in this connection that I would like to mention while speaking in regard to cotton. The total production, as I said, is about 16,000,000 bales. A little more than a third of that is retained at home. The other two-thirds or less goes abroad. That would mean the export of about 10,400,000 bales in the year, 200,000 bales in a month. Let us look at the recent shipments of cotton. I say this to hold out a word of hope to those who are interested in that line of production. Since January 2 there has not been a single week when the average export has not been above 200,000 bales. It is true that there would naturally be large shipments at this season of the year, but when you take into account the war, we are doing well, and conditions approximate the normal when you send an average of 200,000 bales per week. For the week ending January 2 there was sent abroad 191,000 bales; January 9, 315,000 bales; January 16, 218,000 bales; January 23, 255,000 bales; and January 30, 398,166 bales. Keep up that rate for 26 weeks of the year, and the whole we have for export will be carried abroad to a variety of ports.

"There is another thing that some of you may have noticed in a newspaper paragraph this morning, which is exceedingly significant. In the port of Galveston the quoted rate on cotton has fallen from $3.50 per hundred to $2.50 to Bremen; to Rotterdam, from $2.50 to $2 and $2.10; to Barcelona, from $1.35 to 85 cents. It would seem from this that while we have been talking on the shipping bill prices have been going down, and that raises the very important question as to whether it is not best to deliberate and to talk once in a while.

DANGEROUS POSSIBILITIES.

"I have been interested in many measures in the Senate and House of Representatives, but, my fellow citizens, I know of none that seems to me is fraught with more dangerous possibilities. You must always take into account in every piece of legislation not only what it is in itself but the precedent that it establishes. What will be done next? Why, it seems to me that in every word that Secretary McAdoo uttered against the lending of $250,000,000 to the cotton growers he was condemning the spending of money out of the Treasury which would inure to the benefit of some particular locality in this country. He referred to $28,000,000 loaned to the States. Does anybody deny that that is a fair debt? But the Treasurer of the United States was directed by Congress never to collect a nickel of it until further ordered, and you and I will have passed into another sphere before that further order is issued. So it is in regard to this shipping bill. If the shipping corporation is once organized and some one can get lower rates than the normal—can get advantages over his competitor—the agitation to continue it will remain long after its usefulness has been disproved and the boats ought to be sold.

"There are some things that it does not do to trifle with, my friends. If above anything else in my life I have wanted to take a stand, it is for the people and all the people of the United States against any section and any party. I deplore the fact that an organized minority or interest, small in number, is often more influential here at Washington than the great body of the people who, hampered by inertia and lack of interest, do not give sufficient attention to the general good. A public man oftentimes promotes his political chances more by a single bill that helps a single person than by any statute for the general good that he may be instrumental in enacting.

"I repeat—while we have been deliberating the reason for this bill has gone by or is going by. The arguments on behalf of it made at the beginning were abandoned. Now that relations with South America do not require increased shipping, some other reason is proposed.

OPPOSITION TO SHIP SUBSIDY.

"I have always opposed ship subsidy. I have stood with the minority of my party against this measure for these many years. I do not believe you will succeed in building up a merchant marine in that way. The more subsidy you pay the more you will be asked. There is a misapprehension about it. It is said that Germany and England have subsidized their ships. It is true that they do subsidize naval auxiliaries and boats like those belonging to the Cunard Line, but the tramp boat, which does most of the freight business, takes its chances on the waters of the sea. What is the reason our merchant marine has been decadent? It is closely associated with conditions which explain the marvelous progress of the American people.

SHIPPING-TRADE PROFITS.

"There is no trade which involves so little profit and so much hardship as the shipping trade. In Great Britain boats are built and then bonds to 65 per cent of their value at 4 per cent can be issued on them. They are built much more cheaply because they build many of the same type. Then when boats are sent out to sea our spirit of humanity toward the seaman is stronger than in Europe. We give him better food, we give him better wages, and we give him less hours. After all, you come up against this great proposition that in this land of ours there is a panoply of opportunities for investment on the land. We have here a great continent only partially developed, in some portions only scratched, and the genius of our people, their desire for investment, runs in that direction.

"Then, over on the other side of the water they have a class of sailors who for generation after generation, father, son, grandson, and on down indefinitely, follow the sea, while in our country when a man gets to be a mate he sends his son to the high school; he gets an education there, and in the abundant growth of American life that young fellow becomes a lawyer or a doctor and forsakes his father's calling.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

"Something has been said about the Panama Canal. The Government of the United States bought the rights of the new Panama Canal Co., and in buying them they got the railroad and ships and had them on their hands. In the building of the canal, that colossal enterprise, it was necessary to ship a great quantity of freight, such as cement, machinery, and supplies, and incidentally it has transacted a certain amount of general freight business. It is not in any way analogous to the present proposal.

"With reference to the currency bill, I want to say here that I was one of the men who had to do with the framing of the Aldrich-Vreeland bill, in the face of stubborn opposition from the other side, but the time came when the stone that the builders rejected became the head of the corner. With regard to the Federal reserve act, I did not vote in favor of it, but I did say, however, it would better the conditions as they previously existed. There was a commission which worked on the currency and banking problem, of which commission I had the honor to be a member for something like four years, and the accusation of plagiarism can be made with absolute certainty against the framers of the Federal reserve act when they look to that report, because its essential recommendations were all embodied and it furnished the basis for the present measure. I do not myself believe in this idea of the Government owning notes—I do not know that I would express myself so strongly as Senator ROOT, whom the secretary has quoted, and I do not believe that the experiment of issuing or guaranteeing currency which has been abandoned by every Government in the world, after it was tried by them and they had burned their fingers, should, even in this indirect way, be tried by our Government. Let the banks that issue this currency and get the benefit of it take care of the gold redemption and not call on Uncle Sam to help them out if they get into trouble. It may be a good thing, but I do not believe in the principle of it."

ORGANIZATION OF CITY GOVERNMENT.

Mr. FLETCHER. I present an article entitled "An outline for a preliminary municipal survey and a description of the organization of city government," by Mr. Le Roy Hodges, of Petersburg, Va. I desire that it may be printed as a public document, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Printing for action.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The article will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

REPORT OF CHIEF OF STAFF, UNITED STATES ARMY.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the report of the Chief of Staff, United States Army, Maj. Gen. W. W. Wotherspoon, to the Secretary of War, dated November 15, 1914, is out of print. There is a great demand for the report, and I should like to have it printed as a public document. It is a short report, comprising only 15 pages.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator from Connecticut if that is the report from the War Department?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Yes; it is the report of the Chief of Staff of the Army. I ask that it may be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

GOVERNMENT-OWNED SHIPS.

Mr. McLEAN. I ask to have printed in the RECORD about 25 lines from the London Spectator, which relate to some experiences of Australia and Brazil with government-owned ships.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Spectator, Jan. 30, 1915.]

THE AMERICAN GOVERNMENT AS A SHIPOWNER.

To the EDITOR OF THE SPECTATOR.

SIR: Your correspondent "A Jeffersonian Democrat" asks in his letter under the above title in the Spectator of January 16 whether there is any modern precedent for State ownership of a merchant marine. One is to be found in Australia, where the labor factions have had a good run of late. According to the Shipbuilding and Shipping Record of August 6 last, the Fisher government some two and a half years ago bought a steamer—the Stuart—from a private company for £10,400, and another £5,900 was expended in refitting her. She earned in two years £2,381, and was sold last summer for £6,200, the estimated loss of £10,000 falling on the shoulders of the electorate. Another State-owned steamer is the Western Australia, purchased in 1912 by the labor-governed State bearing the same name. She was bought for £39,500, and altogether cost about £73,000. The Government was then trying to sell the ship for £45,000. There are, of course, other instances, particularly where a shipping company has been so backed up, subsidized, and financed by a State as to make the concern to all intents and purposes a State-owned company. One of this class is the Lloyd Braziliero fleet, which the Brazilian Government put up for sale last year, without, however, finding a purchaser.

I am, sir, etc.,

SHIPOWNER.

[Our correspondent forgets an earlier precedent, the London County Council's attempt to run a fleet of passenger steamers on the Thames. The result is never mentioned in progressive circles in the metropolis.—EDITOR SPECTATOR.]

LIMITATION OF DEBATE.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, have we passed the point in morning business when Senate resolutions are in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. We were on the order of concurrent and other resolutions. That would include Senate resolutions.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, Mr. President, I submit the resolution of which I gave notice several days ago, which is now on the desk, proposing to amend the standing rules of the Senate, and I ask that it be read.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I understand it is not a question of the consideration of resolutions at this time; it is a question of submitting resolutions. The order of business is the presentation of resolutions, as I understand.

Mr. NORRIS. This is a resolution which I am offering, and I have asked that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator gave notice of the resolution, and he now offers it. The Secretary will read it.

The resolution (S. Res. 549) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the standing rules of the Senate be amended by adding a new rule, as follows:

"Rule XLI. It shall be in order during the morning hour to make a motion that any bill or resolution then on the calendar shall be considered under the terms of this rule. Such motion when made shall lie over one day and shall then be decided without debate. No Senator shall be allowed to vote on a motion to consider a bill or resolution under this rule who is bound by any caucus or conference of Senators to vote in any particular way on said bill or resolution or any amendment thereon; but when any Senator's right to vote upon such motion is challenged such Senator shall be allowed to determine for himself whether he is disqualified from voting on said motion. When it has been decided to consider a bill or resolution under this rule the same shall first be considered in general debate, during which time no Senator, except by unanimous consent, shall be allowed to speak more than three hours. At the close of general debate the bill or resolution shall be read for amendments, and on any amendment that may be offered no Senator, except by unanimous consent, shall speak for more than 15 minutes: Provided, That any Senator who has not spoken for three hours in general debate shall, in addition to said 15 minutes, be allowed additional time; but in no case shall such additional time or times, including the time used by such Senator in general debate, exceed in the aggregate three hours: Provided further, That if unanimous consent for additional time is asked in behalf of any Senator, either during general debate or when the bill or resolution is being considered for amendment, and the same is refused, it shall be in order by motion to extend the time of such Senator for a time to be named in said motion, which motion shall be decided without debate. When the bill or resolution is being read for amendment all debate shall be confined to the amendment which is then pending."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Every proposition in this proposed rule has been discussed both ways, up and down, for several days, and I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. OVERMAN. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. Do I understand that objection is made?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, as I understand, the resolution goes over for a day under the rule?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, executive clerk, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On February 17, 1915:

S. 145. An act for the relief of Charles Richter;

S. 1044. An act for the relief of Byron W. Canfield;

S. 1377. An act for the relief of Alfred S. Lewis;

S. 1703. An act for the relief of George P. Chandler;

S. 2304. An act for the relief of Chris Kuppler;

S. 2882. An act for the relief of Charles M. Clark;

S. 5695. An act for the relief of the Southern Transportation Co.; and

S. 5970. An act for the relief of Isaac Bethurum.

On February 18, 1915:

S. 1304. An act authorizing the Department of State to deliver to Capt. P. H. Uberroth, United States Revenue-Cutter Service, and Gunner Carl Johannson, United States Revenue-Cutter Service, watches tendered to them by the Canadian Government.

IMPORT DUTIES COLLECTED AT VERA CRUZ.

Mr. CUMMINS. I ask unanimous consent to take from the calendar Senate resolution 514, being Order of Business No. 800, and, in accordance with the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], to have it referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. I wanted it disposed of in the Senate, but it is very evident that I can not secure disposition of it; and I ask that it be disposed of as desired by the chairman of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and that course will be taken.

DETAIL OF MAJORS IN ORDNANCE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. On behalf of the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, who is not able to be present, I desire to ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 17765, to regulate details of majors in the Ordnance Department.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. FLETCHER. What is the bill?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is a bill to regulate details of majors in the Ordnance Department.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Nebraska that I have received a number of letters in relation to the bill, and I think I referred one letter to the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] yesterday or the day before, asking him to consider the objections to the bill that are raised in the letter. I hope the Senator will not ask unanimous consent this morning for the consideration of the bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It was desired by the War Department to secure, if possible, the passage of the bill, which proposes to correct what was probably an error in an appropriation bill passed a year ago. The bill really reenacts the law which was in effect for five or six years preceding the passage of the last appropriation bill; but, of course, if there is any objection, I suppose it can not be considered. It is requested by the Secretary of War, and was passed unanimously by the House of Representatives.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if it is necessary, of course, in an emergency matter I will not object. I really wanted, however, to have the Senator who reported the bill consider the letters I have received in reference to it.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It provides that majors may be detailed in the Ordnance Department, under section 26 of the act approved February 2, 1901, and acts amendatory thereof, without a compulsory period of service out of that department.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROMOTION OF AMERICAN COMMERCE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. LODGE and Mr. SMITH of Michigan addressed the Chair.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, is there not a resolution coming over from yesterday?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is not morning business.

Mr. LODGE. Then a resolution which goes over under the rule one day loses all privilege and is not taken up automatically? It always has been done. If a resolution is introduced, and objection is made, it goes over under the rule one day and comes up the next day automatically.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Where is the rule for it?

Mr. LODGE. If there be no rule for it, then the objection that carries it over one day kills it. I have never seen it questioned. That is the reason why I made the inquiry.

Mr. FLETCHER. It comes up on motion.

Mr. LODGE. I only want to know the new rules as they are made; that is all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There has been no new rule made.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly it is new practice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is probably true. It is new practice, but not a new rule.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will venture to inquire if the fact that, under the rule, a resolution goes over one day does not carry with it the assumption that it comes up the next day?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The presumption has always been that it came up on the next day, and the Chair has been in the habit of automatically laying such resolutions before the Senate; but upon attention being called to the rule, the Chair does not find any rule which authorizes the Chair automatically to lay it before the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. I submit, Mr. President, that it comes up on application under the rules.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly. The Chair has no——

Mr. ROOT. The rule that a resolution or other matter which is brought before the Senate shall lie over one day for consideration by necessary implication brings it before the Senate at the expiration of that period. Otherwise it would lie over indefinitely; but when the time is stated for which the matter shall lie over, then, upon the expiration of that time, the matter is in the same position that it was when it was originally presented to the Senate, just as when there is a recess or an adjournment to a certain day and hour, upon the expiration of that period the session begins.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if I may be pardoned, since the Chair has stated that there is no rule on the subject, the rule is:

All resolutions shall lie over one day for consideration.

Of course by unanimous consent they can be disposed of at once, as they have been this morning; but if the request that they lie over one day ends them the rule is, of course, pointless. The rule is that a resolution shall lie over one day for consideration.

Mr. STONE. Is it not also true, if the Senator will permit me, that when it is brought up or laid before the Senate by the Chair on the day following, and is taken up and considered, if its consideration is not completed by 2 o'clock it goes to the calendar?

Mr. LODGE. Undoubtedly, but it is entitled to its day in court.

Mr. STONE. I think so. That has been the practice.

Mr. LODGE. That has been the unbroken practice.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts let me call his attention to Rule XXVI?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That rule provides that all reports of committees shall lie over one day for consideration. If the language that the Senator quotes requires a resolution to be disposed of on the next day and gives it precedence, then the similar language applied to the report of a committee would require every committee report to be considered the next day.

I am not objecting to the old practice. I do not want to be misunderstood about that; but just as a matter of curiosity I have myself sought to find a rule which sustained that practice, and I have not been able to find it.

Mr. LODGE. The rule is very simple, that a resolution shall lie over one day for consideration. Of course otherwise the request to lay it over one day kills it at once. It sends it to the calendar at once.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then what becomes of the report of a committee?

Mr. LODGE. But this is not the report of a committee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I understand; but the same language is used in another rule in connection with the report of a committee.

Mr. LODGE. I understand that, but——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If it means necessarily that the resolution is to be considered the next day, would not the same language applying to the report of a committee mean equally that the report of a committee is to be considered the next day?

Mr. LODGE. But, Mr. President, the distinction is very obvious. The report of a committee or a bill goes to the calendar under the rule. A Senate resolution that is introduced does not go to the calendar unless it has been considered and the hour of 2 o'clock has arrived.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But there is nothing in the rules which says it is to be considered the next day.

Mr. LODGE. It has never been to a committee, and it does not go to the calendar until it has had its hour in court, or its day in court. That is the universal practice.

Mr. FLETCHER. Like any other matter, it has to be taken up on motion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not questioning the practice.

Mr. FLETCHER. It does not come up of itself.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I am not objecting to the old practice. I was trying to find something in the rule which required the old practice.

Mr. ROOT. May I make a suggestion there as to a distinction that occurs to my mind upon the observation of the Senator from Georgia? The way in which the report of a committee gets consideration is by being put on the calendar, when it comes up in its regular order. The way in which a resolution which has never been to a committee gets consideration is by being brought up during the morning hour after the routine business. A resolution which has never been to a committee can not get on the calendar except by having consideration during the morning hour after the routine business, and it being ascertained that the period of the morning hour is not sufficient for its consideration, so that the hour expiring while the consideration is still in course, it then goes to the calendar. So the same view which sends the report of a committee to the calendar brings a resolution which has not been to a committee before the Senate in the morning hour of the day after it has been presented.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me, I find nothing in the rule that provides that it is to go to the calendar, and I find nothing in the rule with reference to the report of a committee going to the calendar. It all seems to be based upon practice.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senate will permit the Chair to make a statement about this matter, the view of the Chair will be made plain to the Senate.

It has always been the custom since the Chair has been here that after the order of concurrent and other resolutions the Chair has laid before the Senate resolutions coming over from a preceding day; but upon investigation of the rules it appears that there is nothing in the rules which requires the Chair to do any such thing. Resolutions are provided for in clause 5 of Rule XIV:

All resolutions shall lie over one day for consideration, unless, by unanimous consent, the Senate shall otherwise direct.

While the Chair believes that it would be to the interest of the orderly transaction of business for the Chair to lay down resolutions as they come over from a preceding day, the Chair thinks it is the duty of a Senator who has introduced a resolution which has gone over one day for consideration, at the time when concurrent and other resolutions are called for to call up his resolution. He has a right to call it up and to have it either considered or referred to a committee, but it is not, under the rules of the Senate, the unqualified duty of the Chair to lay it down.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let me ask a parliamentary question, Mr. President. I desire to ask the Chair whether Senate resolution 545, which I introduced three days ago, is upon the desk of the Vice President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It undoubtedly is.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to inquire whether it has not been the custom for resolutions of that character, calling for information, to be laid before the Senate the day following their introduction.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is not any question about that; it has been the custom of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That being true, the author of that resolution having no notice of any departure from the usual custom which has prevailed in the Senate, as announced by the Vice President, I ask that the resolution be laid before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks that is only just, and, unless there is to be an appeal from the ruling, the Chair, on the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan, lays his resolution before the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I be heard just a minute on the question of order?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not intend to discuss the resolution at length.

Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to say this much——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not want to yield the floor.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am not asking the Senator to yield the floor. In this connection I wish to state my opinion in regard to the rules, and I think it is absolutely correct. As I construe the rules, the last order of business stated in the rules before the close of the morning business is the presentation of concurrent and other resolutions. When that order is passed the order of morning business is closed. It is still the morning hour, and it is in order to consider such a resolution during the morning hour, provided it is taken up, but the resolutions are not necessarily laid down. Anyone can move to take up such a resolution, as anyone can move to take up other matters. If not taken up during the morning hour, then it goes to the calendar.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, a resolution asking for information ought not to take very much time, and it is not my purpose to do so. It is a very simple matter. I had supposed it would be laid before the Senate in the ordinary course of procedure, and it is before the Senate.

I desire, Mr. President, simply to say this about it: This is a resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Department of Commerce for certain information which he has said is in his possession, regarding correspondence between himself and a European monarch and a prime minister of a foreign country, wherein he says that he has dispatched an attaché to a foreign port—an attaché who, thank God, to use his own language, speaks the language of that court—and that certain arrangements are under way affecting the foreign policy of this Government.

I regret that the Secretary of the Department of Commerce has felt called upon to discuss a matter of so much importance in such a mysterious way. I think it is outside of the scope of his authority under the law. At a time like this it is most serious if any official of the Government of the United States may undertake to conduct correspondence with a European power without having it pass through the ordinary channels of diplomacy.

I have no feeling about the matter at all. I am sorry that he used the language attributed to him. I have only pointed out the language which I think is very inappropriate in the speech. His entire address meets with my unqualified disapproval. There are insinuations and suggestions throughout that address which do no credit to its author. But the language that is quoted in my resolution, it seems to me, does call for some answer at the hands of the Secretary of the Department of Commerce, and I should like, as the language has not been read, to quote the exact language used by Secretary Redfield.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I would first ask that the resolution be read.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to have the resolution read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 545, submitted by Mr. SMITH of Michigan on the 15th instant, as follows:

Whereas the Secretary of the Department of Commerce, Hon. William C. Redfield, delivered an address before the United States Chamber of Commerce, at its session held in the city of Washington, February 4, 1915, in which the following statement was made:

"I have had a dispatch from the prime minister of a great country abroad, so frank as hardly to be publishable in its original form, almost begging—let us say strongly urging—that America take the place in his country that Europe has laid aside. I have another from a monarch himself of a European power saying frankly that he wanted America to come into his land and take the place which others had hitherto filled.

"To-day an able attaché is there at the court of that monarch, speaking the monarch's language, thank God, and entering his country to do what he can do to unite that nation to ours. The King has said that he will put into America a branch of the bank of his country if we will undertake to establish banks in his country, and that whatever he can do officially to forward American commerce in his land shall be willingly and continuously done"; and

Whereas under the present delicate and critical state of international relations arising from the assertion of neutral and belligerent rights and obligations during the present war, it is desirable that Congress shall know how many and what different departments of our Government are engaged in carrying on negotiations with foreign powers, and whether such negotiations are of a character to disturb the balance of conditions created by war between other powers and to involve the United States in violation of neutrality: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate copies of the communications referred to in the remarks above quoted and of the instructions to and the reports from the attaché therein mentioned.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I understand the Chair to hold that such resolutions are before the Senate subject to a motion to take any particular one up, but that they do not come up automatically for consideration and there is no rule which puts them before the Senate. I shall not object to a motion by the Senator from Michigan to take up this resolution. I have not any objection at all——

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; that was not the ruling of the Chair. The ruling of the Chair was that there is no particular order of business which requires the Chair to lay such resolutions before the Senate, but as there is a clause calling for "concurrent and other resolutions," a Senator who on yesterday introduced a resolution which was laid over under the rule has a right during the morning hour to call it up for consideration by the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Without a motion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. A motion is not necessary. He has a right to call it up.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I will make very short work of what I have to say about the resolution. This is not a pleasant duty. My attention has been called to what I regard as a somewhat serious error upon the part of the Secretary of the Department of Commerce in the address which he delivered to the United States Chamber of Commerce. My attention has been called to it by citizens of my own State who felt that if the Secretary was in correspondence with European monarchs and prime ministers they ought to know with whom he was in correspondence and what that correspondence was about. Whether Teuton or Slav or Hottentot, or whoever it was, they felt that they were entitled to know what this officer of the Government, whose duties do not take him into the field of diplomacy, has been writing to foreign monarchs about.

I have formed no hasty conclusion. I did not accept a newspaper report of the language used and most severely criticized, but I sent to the secretary of the chamber of commerce and asked for an official copy of the address of Secretary Redfield. I have that revised address before me now. I think this language is unfortunate. I think it is due to the Senate that he explain it. I have not the slightest wish to humiliate him. If what he has done is in the interest of the Government which he serves, and serves faithfully, I shall be very glad, but a mysterious statement of that kind affecting our diplomatic status with European powers is altogether too important to be overlooked.

It is not the first time that we have called upon the departments of the Government for an explanation of utterances. If the party to which I belong was in control of the Government of the United States at this time, so critical, I should be the first to say that language of that kind was inappropriate. I hope that the Secretary can make some explanation which will at least take away the sting of inappropriateness which now seems to surround it.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Does the Senator rise to ask a question of me, or is he addressing the Chair in his own right?

Mr. STONE. I thought the Senator had concluded.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am through. I do not want to say any more.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, in the resolution offered by the Senator from Michigan he quoted some excerpts from what he says is a stenographic report of a speech delivered by the Secretary of Commerce before the Chamber of Commerce of the United States on the 4th day of the present month. From these quotations it is apparent that the communications referred to by the Secretary, and to which the Senator referred in his speech, were personal rather than official communications made to him. They were not, as I understand, drawn out by any request emanating from the Secretary, but were communications voluntarily made by certain officials of certain foreign Governments.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. I would think, Mr. President, that the Secretary would be entitled to use a correspondence of that character in such way as he saw proper. As to the wisdom of using it as he did, that was a question addressing itself alone to his judgment and discretion. I can not see upon what theory or by what authority the Senate can call the Secretary to account and demand that he lay before the Senate a correspondence of that kind.

Nevertheless I am prepared to say that the Secretary of Commerce is entirely willing to give to the Senate all the information asked for by the resolution of the Senator from Michigan.

I have just received a communication from Secretary Redfield relating to this resolution, which I will read, and I think it constitutes a sufficient answer to the Senator's criticism, but if he thinks otherwise I have no objection to the passage of the resolution. The letter to which I refer is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, February 17, 1915.

DEAR SENATOR STONE: My attention has been directed to Senate resolution No. 545, introduced by Senator SMITH of Michigan on February 15, and I have procured a copy thereof. I am aware that at this writing the resolution has not been adopted, but the whole matter is so simple and clear that it is a pleasure, in advance of its adoption, to furnish anew the information. I say "anew" because the matter was widely published throughout the country months ago, and I confess to a little surprise that the author of the resolution seems not to have observed this fact.

Having before me no copy of the address from which an alleged extract is made, I do not now raise the question of the accuracy of the supposed quotation. The statement is substantially correct, whether the language be accurately quoted or not.

The implication in the paragraph at the top of page 2, to the general effect that negotiations may be pending abroad between the different departments of the Government which may disturb matters, is a wholly gratuitous one. There are no facts either in my statement or in the actual occurrence to justify it. Only one, I venture to think, desiring to imply improprieties would have suggested it in the face of the widely published facts. These are as follows:

On October 2, 1914, I received from the Secretary of State a paraphrased copy of a dispatch from Ambassador Willard under date of August 30, giving somewhat in detail the subject matter of an audience with the King of Spain concerning the development of trade between Spain and the United States. I also received a letter from the President stating that he had asked the Secretary of State to send me the copy of the dispatch and asking me if I could devise means to bring this matter in some effective way to the attention of our commercial public. This was done, and on October 9, 1914, the matter was given to the press and published in the Consular and Trade Reports for that day. A copy is attached. A copy of the paraphrased dispatch is at the service of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate if they desire it, though I presume the more usual way would be to obtain the same from the Department of State.

In like manner the Argentine ambassador to the United States brought to me on November 5, 1914, a cable message from the minister of foreign relations of the Argentine Republic to their ambassador, dated October 31, 1914. Upon my suggesting to the ambassador that the matter was one, as indeed it was intended to be, of interest to American commerce, he very courteously obtained the consent of his Government to the publication of a transcription of the dispatch. It appeared on the first page of the Daily Consular and Trade Reports for November 11, 1914, and was widely circulated throughout the press. A copy of the statement to the press follows:

"At an interview between the Argentine ambassador and the Secretary of Commerce on the evening of the 5th instant an important cable message from the Argentine Government bearing upon the commercial relations between the two countries was presented. Through the courtesy of the Argentine ambassador, and with the consent of his Government, the publicity of this dispatch is permitted. Its importance is obvious.

"It is a cablegram from the minister of foreign relations of Argentina to the ambassador of that country, dated October 31, 1914, and is as follows:

"'There is at present no congestion of merchandise in our ports. Wheat and flour are not exported at present because of the embargo established by the executive power on those products. Corn, meat, and wool are exported without great difficulty, but we fear the scarcity of the means of transportation for our production in the near future. A very effective outlet would be the arrival of steamers from the United States with usual cargoes—that is to say, impure naphtha, wood, iron, agricultural machines and implements, petroleum, furniture, lubricating oils, etc. Those boats would return with our products—that is to say, meat, wool, hides, quebracho, live stock, etc. American manufacturers can occupy the place left vacant by European industry in all the branches that have been served by it. The present moment offers to American manufacturers very appreciable advantages for occupying positions, profiting by the present European inability. In order to get these advantages they must take the initiative themselves, sending, at least, small cargoes and also agents, and especially adapting themselves to the custom of not demanding cash payment, as has been practiced by others with very well known success.'

Mr. LIPPITT rose.

Mr. STONE. Wait just a minute.

"The Department of Commerce hopes and expects that American manufacturers will take full advantage of the opportunity thus extended them through the courtesy of the Argentine Government."

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President——

Mr. STONE. Will the Senator let me conclude this?

Mr. LIPPITT. Yes. I merely wanted to ask the Senator one question, but I will wait.

Mr. STONE. I shall yield as soon as I finish reading. This letter of the Secretary proceeds:

It is a pleasure to say that, pursuant to the above, our commercial attaché, Dr. C. W. A. Veditz, is now in Madrid, endeavoring to promote the cordial relations with that country for which so much hope was expressed in the dispatch from our ambassador there, communicated through the Department of State, and that our commercial attaché, Dr. Albert Hale, is now in Buenos Aires, endeavoring to further the kindly desire of the Argentine Government for closer commercial relations with that sister Republic.

I need hardly point out that in neither of these cases were any negotiations conducted with foreign powers. The facts speak for themselves.

I shall be glad to have you give the fullest publicity to this letter.

Yours, very truly,

WILLIAM C. REDFIELD, Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM J. STONE,
Chairman Committee on Foreign Relations,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. LIPPITT. I only wanted to ask the Senator from Missouri if I correctly understand the circumstances as they are related there? I understand that that dispatch, to which the distinguished Secretary of Commerce refers, is a dispatch from the Government of Argentina to their ambassador in Washington, and that from their ambassador the Secretary of Commerce received a copy of that dispatch, or from some proper source he received a copy of that dispatch. That is the circumstance, I understand, which is related. I see here in the language which the Secretary of Commerce uses in his speech he says:

I have had a dispatch.

What he says in his speech is that he is in communication personally, directly, with the prime minister of a great country abroad. What he should have said, I presume, is that he had had a copy of a communication which the prime minister abroad had sent to his ambassador in this country. The two things are quite different.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, that is splitting hairs in order to make a criticism. I have read the statement of the Secretary, and it speaks for itself.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Now, let me ask the Senator from Missouri a question. Having read that statement——

Mr. STONE. I have not completed the statement.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; I understand; and I am not going to interfere; but I should like to ask the Senator whether he thinks, in view of the quotation from the Secretary's letter which he has just read, the Secretary was justified in saying—

I have had a dispatch from the prime minister of a great country abroad, so frank as hardly to be publishable in its original form, almost begging—let us say strongly urging—that America take the place in his country that Europe has laid aside.

As to the statement made by the Senator as coming from the Secretary of the department, I take no exception to the manner in which he has stated it, and his intentions in that regard I take no exception to; but when he says he has a communication from the monarch of a foreign country personally, and that he has information from him which he can not publish, it looks as though there were too many departments of the American Government conducting the diplomatic correspondence of this country with foreign powers. I do not think the Senator from Missouri would like that any better than I myself like it, and an explanation will be very satisfactory. I do not seek to put the Secretary in a wrong light, but I have quoted his language. He says he did not have it before him when he wrote that letter to the Senator.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I have no patience to engage in hair-splitting business. The fact is, as shown by the letter, that the Secretary was absolutely correct when he said he had dispatches or was in possession of dispatches from the prime minister or minister of foreign affairs of two foreign countries. What difference does it make whether a dispatch was sent directly to Secretary Redfield or sent to an ambassador in Washington and by him turned over to Secretary Redfield, with liberty to use it in any way he pleased? When it is undertaken to draw fine distinctions of that kind it is manifest on its face that Senators are determined to indulge in criticisms of an unfriendly character, whether or no.

Now, Mr. President, I want to complete the statement I was making. The Secretary refers to the fact that the information conveyed in the extract from his speech quoted in the resolution had been given to the public long before the speech was made, both through the press and through consular reports. I have in my hand the Daily Consular and Trade Report of October 9, 1914, sent to me as an inclosure by the Secretary. The item to which the Secretary refers me in that report is very brief, and I will read it:

[Telegram from the American embassy, Madrid.]

SPAIN DESIRES AMERICAN CONNECTIONS.

The Spanish minister of foreign affairs states that the Bank of Spain will try to establish a branch in the United States similar to the branches which it now has in Paris and London. He added that he hoped an American financial institution might be located in Madrid.

The minister of foreign affairs also urged the advantages which would accrue from a direct American steamship line to Mediterranean ports whose ships would touch regularly at Cadiz or Vigo, promising regular and improved through railroad facilities from these points and also proper railroad communication to Madrid.

The present attitude of the Spanish Government offers a great commercial opportunity to the United States at this time and it is urged that advantage be taken of it.

That was printed in the Daily Consular and Trade Report of October 9 last and was commented upon throughout the country by the press.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, that merely indicates that that is not the dispatch which "is so frank as hardly to be publishable." That is the language the Secretary used; and if it was published in October, apart from his speech on the 4th day of February of this year, it indicates that that publication has not had very large circulation.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I have no time to waste in replying to criticisms of that flimsy character.

I hold in my hand also a Daily Consular and Trade Report, dated November 11, 1914, containing an article headed "Opportunity for United States trade in Argentina." The part the Secretary refers me to is too long to read; it covers three pages of this report; but it is a very interesting document relating to the increase and exploitation of our trade in the Argentine and touching also upon the matter of shipping facilities, and all that. All this matter is, in my judgment, a very excellent and forceful argument in favor of the shipping bill we are trying to enact. Now, Mr. President, I ask leave, without reading, to print these three pages of the Daily Consular and Trade Report of November 11 last in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

OPPORTUNITY FOR UNITED STATES TRADE IN ARGENTINA.

The present opportunity for American exporters to secure extensive trade advantages in Argentina is set forth succinctly in a cablegram from the Argentine minister of foreign relations to the Argentine ambassador to the United States, Mr. Naón. This cablegram has been transmitted to the Department of Commerce as the official summary of present conditions by the Argentine Government, and is as follows:

"There is at present no congestion of merchandise in our ports. Wheat and flour are not exported at present because of the embargo established by the executive power on those products. Corn, meat, and wool are exported without great difficulty, but we fear the scarcity of the means of transportation for our production in the near future. A very effective outlet would be the arrival of steamers from the United States with usual cargoes—that is to say, impure naphtha, wood, iron, agricultural machines and implements, petroleum, furniture, lubricating oils, etc. Those boats would return with our products—that is to say, meat, wool, hides, quebracho, live stock, etc. American manufacturers can occupy the place left vacant by European industry in all the branches that have been served by it. The present moment offers to American manufacturers very appreciable advantages for occupying positions, profiting by the present European inability. In order to get these advantages they must take the initiative themselves, sending, at least, small cargoes and also agents, and especially adapting themselves to the custom of not demanding cash payment, as has been practiced by others with very well-known success."

FUNDAMENTAL COMMERCIAL CONDITIONS IN ARGENTINA.

The opportunity for United States exporters is all the better because of the spirit of impartiality and fairness toward all foreign goods which governs fundamental commercial conditions in Argentina. This point is elaborated in a recent communication from the Argentine minister of finance, Señor Enrique Carbo, to a financial institution in the United States, which also sets forth the importance of helping the industries necessary to the development of Argentine commerce in order to reap an ultimate trade benefit. The article follows:

"I believe that commercial relations based upon the constant interchange of the products that are required by the two countries for consumption or for the development of their economic activities will necessarily strengthen the international ties between them and stimulate other relationship to the profit of this Republic and of its worthy North American sister. I do not believe that it is possible for commercial intercourse between two free nations to result in loss to the one and profit to the other. In the development of commercial relations with our country the United States need only follow the example of European countries that have most rapidly succeeded in occupying the first place in the Argentine market. They gave the initial impulse to industries that were most necessary to the development of our commerce. They consulted our merchants regarding the tendencies and the tastes of our consumers and granted them credit facilities by founding in this country great banking institutions. Also they have established excellent lines of navigation and maintained continental traffic by means of moderate freight rates. In order to keep the transportation service going they arranged to take the greater part of our products to supply their markets and their big manufacturing concerns.

"Such a system of encouraging commerce has proved profitable to the countries that put it into practice, as is shown by the world's commercial statistics of the last 30 years. In these the United States figures as one of our best customers, precisely because of the adoption of the methods referred to.

"Neither the United States nor any other country has ever found, nor will any ever find, any obstacle in the way of the exercise of its full commercial activities in this Republic. Argentine legislation is liberal to business. Our customhouse regulations have not been modified for some 10 years. They influence imports so little that prices ruling on the markets have shown scarcely any effect on account of them. The taxes levied on goods for international consumption are the smallest possible. The same thing may be said of the Republic's fiscal burden upon our national industries, our transportation lines, and our business with the neighboring Republics that are supplied from our markets or through our ports.

TARIFF POLICY—INFORMATION AS TO POSSIBLE IMPORTS FROM UNITED STATES.

"Our tariff policy is based upon absolute international impartiality. One clause in article 74 of our customs law makes reciprocity treaties unnecessary because it authorized the Executive to reduce by one-half the duties on goods imported from countries that allow special privileges to Argentine products, and to increase by as much as half the tariff on the imports from countries that take measures which benefit the entry of merchandise of other nations to the detriment of our exports. Legislation is now pending that will create a permanent organ of the Government, whose mission will be to propose gradual modifications of duties as the necessities of our internal economy and those of our foreign commerce require. In my opinion the United States could not have a better opportunity than exists at the present moment to develop its commerce in the countries reached by the River Plate, either by increasing the quantity sold here of North American products which competed before with those of European countries now at war, or by promoting new industries that may supply such articles as are not now exported from your country.

"The department under my direction is able to supply representatives of business in the United States with lists of the principal imports which your Nation may undertake to market in Argentina, with assurance of success and of probable increase in the future.

INVESTMENT OPPORTUNITIES—OCEAN TRANSPORTATION.

"There is an increasing development of profitable opportunities for investments of foreign capital in this country. The people of North America can with advantage apply their own experience in studying this phase of opportunity in Argentina. The capital which has run the greatest risk has been that which was attracted by high interest rates. The rapid increase in land values has brought extraordinarily large returns within the shortest possible time. But capital invested with the productive capacity of the soil, the development of agriculture and the cattle industries, and the manufacture of our natural products taken into account can rely upon profits that come somewhat more slowly, but are undoubtedly more certain. The expansion to their present proportions of many of the largest concerns in the Republic is due to this conservative method of operation.

"Finally, I must advise you that we possess only the beginning of a mercantile marine, and this is needed for exclusive coast service between the cities and along the navigable rivers. Fortunately, the countries that have commercial relations with us have understood that the best way to develop those relations was through the establishment of great navigation lines, and the organization of companies destined exclusively for transportation in the Southern Hemisphere.

"I hope that this which I have said may be of service and that it will contribute to the impulse that will increase business relations between the Argentine Republic and the United States."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, has the Senator finished?

Mr. STONE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Evidently, Mr. President, there is a disposition upon the part of the Secretary to set the Committee upon Foreign Relations right at least upon the criticism which has been directed against his speech of February 4. I do not desire to embarrass him in the slightest; I give him credit for being a patriotic and an upright man.

Mr. STONE. I venture to say to the Senator that this resolution and these remarks do not in the least, and can not in the least, embarrass the Secretary of Commerce.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not want to do so. I was going to suggest, inasmuch as he has already written the Foreign Relations Committee, that we refer the resolution to that committee, and if the committee, or any member of the committee, desires to interrogate the Secretary, it may be done. That will be quite satisfactory to me.

Mr. STONE. I have no objection to that disposition being made of the resolution.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The explanation made, as far as it goes, is undoubtedly satisfactory to the Senator. I take no exception to it; but the Secretary did not have his speech before him when he wrote the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. Concluding, Mr. President, I desire to say that the effort of the Secretary of Commerce to give to our business men, manufacturers, and others the benefit of this information, showing the great desire of the Governments of Spain and Argentina to establish closer commercial and business relations with this country, is commendable in every way. I apprehend that if this information had been in the hands of some others I know of it would not have been given to the public just at this time, because there are others in this land, I regret to say, who, in my opinion, are not anxious at this moment to increase or multiply the volume of our business at home or abroad. The Secretary, nevertheless, performed a commendable public service when he gave publicity to this information.

I am content, sir, that the resolution may be referred, in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan, to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

RIVER AND HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BURTON. Resolution No. 541, merely asking for information, is, I take it, in the same position with the one just adopted. I ask to have it presented to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. At the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio, the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be stated.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 541), introduced by Mr. BURTON on the 13th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested and directed to transmit to the Senate a statement of the balances to the credit of the respective river and harbor projects of the country now under improvement, remaining unexpended and available on January 1, 1915, or February 1, 1915, as may be most convenient.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

STEAMBOAT-INSPECTION SERVICE.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, does that complete the morning business?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Unless there is some other resolution coming over from a previous day and there is a request to take it up, morning business is closed.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask, in the first place, that H. R. 20282, a House bill which has been reported to the Senate and is identical with a Senate bill on the calendar, Order of Business No. 734, may be substituted for Order of Business No. 734, and the latter indefinitely postponed.

Mr. OVERMAN. What is it about?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that has been done once before.

Mr. FLETCHER. This is another bill, I think. It is in the same situation as a bill with reference to which the Senator from North Dakota made a similar motion.

Mr. SMOOT. May the Secretary state the request again?

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Florida requests that House bill 20282, received from the House, shall take the place on the calendar of Order of Business No. 734, Senate bill 6781, with exactly the same title.

Mr. PENROSE. What is the title?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. PENROSE. Let us have the title stated.

The SECRETARY. The title of the bill is—

A bill to provide for the appointment of 11 supervising inspectors, Steamboat-Inspection Service, in lieu of 10.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered, and without objection Senate bill 6781 is indefinitely postponed.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the House amendments to Senate bill 5259.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. The motion is not debatable, Mr. President.

Mr. GRONNA. I simply wanted to proceed to discuss the bill when it was taken up.

The SECRETARY. Senate bill 5259 is entitled—

A bill to establish one or more United States Navy mail lines between the United States and South America and between the United States and the countries of Europe.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida moves to proceed to the consideration of the House amendments to the bill the title of which has just been stated by the Secretary. [Putting the question.] By the sound the ayes seem to have it.

Mr. LODGE. I make the point of no quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gallinger	Myers	Smith, Md.
Bankhead	Goff	Nelson	Smith, Mich.
Borah	Gronna	Norris	Smith, S. C.
Brady	Hitchcock	O'Gorman	Smoot
Brandegee	Hollis	Overman	Stephenson
Bryan	Hughes	Page	Sterling
Burleigh	James	Penrose	Stone
Burton	Johnson	Perkins	Swanson
Catron	Jones	Pittman	Thomas
Chilton	Kern	Pomerene	Thompson
Clark, Wyo.	La Follette	Ransdell	Tillman
Clarke, Ark.	Lane	Reed	Townsend
Crawford	Lea, Tenn.	Sheppard	Vardaman
Culberson	Lee, Md.	Sherman	Walsh
Cummins	Lewis	Shields	Weeks
Dillingham	Lippitt	Shively	Williams
du Pont	McLean	Simmons	Works
Fall	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ariz.
Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.

Mr. RANSDELL. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] is absent on account of ill health.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-four Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Florida moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the House amendments to Senate bill 5259.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. The pending bill, in its latest form, provides for the creation of a corporation which shall have the power to construct, purchase, and operate ships in the foreign trade of the United States, and the power to charter and lease vessels for the same purpose. The Government is, through a shipping board provided for in the bill, to subscribe to at least 51 per cent of the capital stock of the corporation. Although the language is by no means clear, I assume that the provision in section 1 regarding the capital stock refers to this corporation and not to the lessee corporation. If this assumption is correct, the initial capital stock of the corporation is to be $10,000,000, of which the United States is to hold at least 51 per cent; the Government may also subscribe to the remainder of the stock if it is not taken by the public. It is also provided that the capital stock may be increased, and of such increase the Government may, without first obtaining the consent of Congress, subscribe to not more than $10,000,000. Consequently, the amount which this bill will authorize the shipping board to invest in the capital stock of the corporation will aggregate $20,000,000 if the Government should be compelled to subscribe to all of the initial capital stock of the corporation, and $15,100,000 if the public takes the 49 per cent of the initial stock offered to it; and the total capital stock that the corporation might issue would, under these circumstances, be $20,000,000 if the Government were compelled to purchase all of the shares of stock, or almost $30,000,000 if the public took 49 per cent of the stock. That, of course, is only the beginning, and I do not doubt that if this bill should become a law we should soon be asked to increase the investment of the Government in the capital stock. In addition to this, authority is given to sell $30,000,000 of Panama Canal bonds, the proceeds to be used in the purchase and construction of ships for the foreign trade.

As to whether the public will subscribe for the stock thus offered, that will, I imagine, depend to some extent on what understanding the public has of the intent and liability of the Government in the matter. If the public is given to understand that dividends are to be guaranteed, and that any losses which may result from the operation of these ships are to be made good from the Public Treasury, I do not apprehend that any difficulty will be found in selling this stock. If, however, the impression prevails that profits are not in any way to be guaranteed, the distrust of the public as to the ability of the Government to conduct anything economically may render somewhat difficult the selling of this stock.

While the Government will be called upon to furnish most of the money needed in this venture, or perhaps all of it, there appears to be some doubt as to how far the control of the Government will go. The Government is to hold not less than 51 per cent of the capital stock, to be voted by the shipping board, or its representative; but there is a provision on page 2 of the bill which, it appears to me, surrenders control, in a very large measure, if not entirely, to the other stockholders. This provision reads as follows:

Such officers and trustees shall be subject to removal at any time by a vote of a majority of the stockholders at any meeting thereof.

This would give a few stockholders, perhaps holding only a few hundred dollars of the capital stock, the power at any time to remove the officers of the corporation. Is there any doubt as to who would actually control the corporation, the United States holding a majority of the stock, or the stockholders having the power to remove the officers whenever they pleased? There may be reasons for placing this provision in the bill, but I have not heard them explained. It appears that this provision nullifies the control of the corporation, which the ownership of the majority of the stock at first glance appeared to give to the Government.

While the corporation is to be authorized to construct, as well as to purchase, ships, the general expectation is that attempts would first be made to purchase them before entering into contracts for the construction of ships. It is self-evident that this would be so if this measure is to bring any relief from the conditions which its supporters say make its passage necessary at this time. Almost from the opening of the war it has been suggested in various quarters—and some of those suggestions have come from what would ordinarily be considered authoritative sources—that the ships to be purchased were the German ships interned in our ports, or, to speak more exactly, imprisoned by the fear of capture by the enemy if they should venture outside of the port. Since attention has been called to the fact that the belligerents might refuse to recognize the transfer of these vessels there has been some attempt to evade this question by stating that these are not the only vessels that can be purchased and that the passage of this bill would not necessarily mean the purchase of these ships. There has been no direct statement, however, that the purchase of these vessels is not contemplated, nor have those in charge of this bill been willing to accept any amendment which would guard against such purchases and the international complications which might result therefrom. The question of the validity of such transfers is therefore a pertinent one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHILTON in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The motion by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to amend Rule XXII of the standing rules of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Dakota will proceed.

Mr. GRONNA. I believe it can safely be said that the courts in this country have uniformly recognized the validity of the sale of merchant vessels by belligerents to neutrals after the outbreak of hostilities where such sale was shown to be a bona fide commercial transaction, and I understand that the trend of English decisions has been in the same direction. I am not satisfied, however, that the broad statement that any such transfer after the outbreak of hostilities would be held valid, provided the purchase was made in good faith, is justified by these decisions. It appears to me that a distinction might be drawn between the case of a vessel the capture of which was certain in case it ventured from port and the case of one of whose capture there was no immediate danger, and that while the transfer of the latter might be considered a commercial transaction in the case of the former, it might be held that the transfer was made in order to evade the consequences resulting from its belligerent nationality. Without attempting to go into this phase of the question, I may say that it does not appear to me that the case of the Baltica, on which the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] laid some stress is a case in point, since it appears that in that case the transfer was made before the outbreak of hostilities, although in anticipation of war.

In the case of the Benito Estenger the Supreme Court makes the statement that "transfers of vessels flagrante bello were originally held to be invalid," but that the rule has been modified, and the court approved the statement from Hall's International Law that in the United States and in England the right to purchase vessels is admitted, but that as the opportunities for fraud are great the circumstances attending a sale will be closely scrutinized. France appears to have adhered to the old rule and to have maintained that the transfer of enemy vessels to a neutral who has knowledge of the outbreak of hostilities is void without regard to the good faith of the transaction. At least some of the other continental powers appear to have followed France in this respect rather than the United States and England. The Russian Prize Regulations of March 27, 1895, contain the following provision, as given in Moore's International Law, section 1188:

> Merchant vessels acquired from a hostile power or its subjects by persons of neutral nationality are acknowledged to be hostile vessels unless it is proven that the acquisition must be considered, according to the laws of the nation to whom the purchasers belong, as having actually taken place before the purchasers received news of the declaration of war, or that the vessels acquired in the manner mentioned, although after the receipt of such news, were acquired quite conscientiously and not for the purpose of covering hostile property.

The decisions and regulations referred to, however, were all made and formulated before the adoption of the London declaration. Article 56 of this declaration deals with the transfer of belligerent vessels to neutrals after the outbreak of hostilities. Extracts from the proceedings of the London conference, submitted by the senior Senator from New York and by the junior Senator from Montana, show that the delegates from the United States and others favored a declaration recognizing the validity of such transfers if bona fide, while delegates from other countries, especially from France, Germany, and Russia, believed that all transfers made after the outbreak of hostilities should be declared void. The article finally adopted as a compromise between these two views is as follows:

> ART. 56. The transfer of an enemy vessel to a neutral flag effected after the outbreak of hostilities is void unless it is proved that such transfer was not made in order to evade the consequences to which an enemy vessel as such is exposed.
> There, however, is an absolute presumption that a transfer is void—
> (1) If the transfer has been made during a voyage or in a blockaded port.
> (2) If a right to repurchase or recover the vessel is reserved to the vendor.
> (3) If the requirements of the municipal law governing the right to fly the flag under which the vessel is sailing have not been fulfilled.

The transfer after the outbreak of hostilities is void unless it is proved that it was not made to evade the consequences to which the enemy vessel as such is exposed. To what consequences is an enemy vessel as such exposed? On the high seas it is exposed to capture by the opposing belligerent. It is also exposed to being interned in a neutral port. If the transfer is made during a voyage or in a blockaded port, the presumption is absolute that such transfer is void, and yet the sale might be as absolute and might be made in as good faith on both sides in such a case as in any other; yet an absolute presumption is raised against its validity. The report made on this article to the London conference by its drafting committee is as follows:

> The rule respecting transfers made after the outbreak of hostilities is more simple. Such a transfer is only valid if it is proved that the object was not to evade the consequences to which an enemy vessel as such is exposed. The rule accepted in respect to transfers made before the outbreak of hostilities is inverted. In that case there is a presumption that the transfer is valid; in the present that it is void, provided always that proof to the contrary may be given. For instance, it might be proved that the transfer had taken place by inheritance.
> Article 56 recites cases in which the presumption that the transfer is void is absolute, for reasons which can be readily understood. In the first case the connection between the transfer and the war risk run by the vessel is evident. In the second the transferee is a mere man of straw, who is treated as owner during a dangerous period, after which the vender will recover possession of his vessel. Lastly, the third case might strictly be regarded as already provided for, since a vessel which lays claim to neutral nationality must naturally prove that she has a right to it.
> At one time provision was made in this article for the case of a vessel which was retained, after the transfer, in the trade in which she had previously been engaged. Such a circumstance is in the highest degree suspicious; the transfer has a fictitious appearance, inasmuch as nothing has changed in regard to the vessel's trade. This would apply, for instance, if a vessel were running on the same line before and after the transfer. It was, however, objected that to set up an absolute presumption would sometimes be too severe, and that certain kinds of vessels as, for example, tank ships could, on account of their build, engage only in a certain definite trade. To meet this objection the word "route" was then added, so that it would have been necessary that the vessel should be engaged in the same trade and on the same route; it was thought that in this way the above contention would have been satisfactorily met. However, the suppression of this case from the list being insisted on, it was agreed to eliminate it. Consequently a transfer of this character now falls within the general rule; it is certainly presumed to be void, but the presumption may be rebutted.

To me this statement appears to indicate what the drafting committee had in mind at the time of formulating this article. It has been urged that this article was merely intended to make void sales not made in good faith, and to place the burden of proving the good faith on the owner of the vessel. It appears to me, however, that transfers not made in good faith—where there was not an actual sale and purchase, but only a pretended one—would fall in one of the three classes of cases where the presumption against the validity of the sale is absolute.

The committee also state that at one time the article contained a provision that there was to be such absolute presumption in cases where the vessel was retained after the transfer in the same trade as that in which she had previously been engaged. If fictitious sales were the only ones which it was intended to make void, what reason would there be for suggesting that an absolute presumption be made in such cases? It appears to me that what the committee must have had in mind in considering that provision was that if an enemy ship were sold to a neutral and continued in the same trade there would be a practical certainty that the ship was sold for the reason that if she continued in the trade under the belligerent flag she would be liable to capture; in other words, that the transfer was made "in order to evade the consequences to which an enemy vessel, as such, is exposed."

The reason why a belligerent would object to the transfer of the merchant vessels of the enemy to a neutral flag is readily apparent. War on the seas is carried on not only against the actual combatants but also against the commerce of the enemy. The aim is not merely to capture the merchant vessels of the enemy but also to destroy so far as possible the trade of the enemy. At one time enemy goods were liable to capture regardless of the nationality of the ship on which they were found, but at length the doctrine of "free ships, free goods" prevailed, and enemy goods not contraband are now exempt from capture if carried by a neutral ship. All enemy goods carried by an enemy ship, however, are liable to capture. Consequently if a belligerent is permitted to sell its ships to neutrals its commerce in other goods than contraband might be carried on without danger of capture; and so far as its trade is concerned, it might actually be to the benefit of a belligerent to be compelled to sell its ships. The war which one belligerent carried on against the commerce of another might to a very large extent be nullified by such transfers of vessels. In addition to this the belligerent would also lose, of course, the chance to capture the ship, and the enemy would have the additional benefit of having the capital which was tied up in the ship returned to its former owner, and thus increase the financial resources of the enemy.

To attempt to destroy the commerce of the enemy of course interferes with the trade of the neutral nations with which that commerce is carried on, and while it may not seem just to us that neutral nations should suffer because of a war for which they are not in any way responsible and with which they have no concern we have to accept the law as it is. A belligerent is likely to be more impressed with his rights as such than those of a neutral, and it must not be forgotten that these cases are decided by the courts of the belligerent making the capture. If we were to purchase the interned German ships, the two nations likely to capture them after the transfer would be England and France. The latter country would have refused to recognize the validity of the transfer, even without the London declaration. I believe there is a possibility that England might formerly have recognized such a transfer as valid, but the English Government has declared its adherence to the London declaration, and its prize courts will observe it in adjudicating these cases. The English and French Governments have not left us in doubt as to how they construe the law. As early as last August, if my memory serves me right, the English and French ambassadors conveyed to our Government their views that the purchase of these German ships would not be valid transfers under the London declaration.

I shall not dwell upon the possible consequences of the seizure and condemnation of a ship belonging to our Government by one of the belligerent powers. While we usually look upon searches and seizures of ships belonging to private individuals as matters of course, leaving it to the prize courts to decide whether the seizure was justified, the state of the public mind would be far different if the people of this country were to see ship after ship purchased by the Government and paid for out of the Public Treasury, seized by English and French warships as soon as they were outside of New York Harbor.

The Senator in charge of this bill has moved to amend the motion to recommit the bill to the committee so as to instruct the committee to report the bill again to the Senate with amendments, one of which reads as follows:

Provided, That in making purchases of ships during the continuance of the present European war no purchase shall be made in a way which will disturb the present conditions of neutrality.

This amendment is presumably to satisfy those who are opposed to the bill in its present form, because they fear that it is intended to purchase the German ships and believe that the validity of such transfers will not be upheld by the prize courts. To me it does not appear that this amendment accomplishes anything. With or without such a provision in this measure, I do not presume that the shipping board would make any purchase which, in their opinion, would "disturb the present conditions of neutrality." Supporters of this bill contend that the purchase of the interned German ships would not be in contravention of international law, and that even if the belligerents should consider it so, they would not at this time dare to seize the ships from fear of incurring our hostility, and that even if they did seize the vessels, there would be no danger of international complications, and that the present conditions of neutrality would therefore not be disturbed in any event. The proposed amendment certainly offers no assurance to anyone who believes it would be an ill-advised and dangerous proceeding to buy these ships at this time. It leaves to the shipping board the question of what would disturb the present conditions of neutrality. The opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, who would be a member of the shipping board, is well known; he does not believe there is any question as to our right to purchase these ships. A person holding this view would certainly see no reason for declining to purchase the ships, even if the proposed amendment is adopted.

I do not know what the views of the other members of the board would be likely to be, but if it is possible for one of them to have these views there is a possibility that at least a majority of the board might have them, and in such an event there is absolutely nothing in this proposed amendment which would prevent them from buying the ships, no matter what others might think as to the danger of international complications resulting from such action. If a majority of this Senate believes that it would be a dangerous experiment to purchase these ships, I believe a provision should be written into it which would prohibit such action, or which would permit it only if the belligerent powers indicated that they would not consider it in contravention of international law. If there is danger that purchases might be made in such a way as to result in international complications, that danger will exist with this amendment in the bill exactly as though there were no such provision.

The reasons for passing this ship-purchase bill presented by President Wilson in his message last December were that countries which the countries now at war had formerly supplied with certain commodities would now be forced to depend on us for these supplies, and that ships were needed to carry this trade which was expected to develop. The President said:

It is of equal consequence that the nations whom Europe has usually supplied with innumerable articles of manufacture and commerce, of which they are in constant need and without which their economic development halts and stands still, can now get only a small part of what they formerly imported and eagerly look to us to supply their all but empty markets. This is particularly true of our own neighbors—the States, great and small, of Central and South America. * * * Here are markets which we must supply, and we must find the means of action.

* * * * * * *

How are we to carry our goods to the empty markets of which I have spoken if we have not the ships? How are we to build up a great trade if we have not the certain and constant means of transportation upon which all profitable and useful commerce depends? And how are we to get the ships if we wait for the trade to develop without them?

* * * * * * *

Hence the pending shipping bill, discussed at the last session, but as yet passed by neither House. In my judgment such legislation is imperatively needed and can not wisely be postponed. The Government must open these gates of trade, and open them wide; open them before it is altogether profitable to open them or altogether reasonable to ask private capital to open them at a venture. It is not a question of the Government monopolizing the field. It should take action to make it certain that transportation at reasonable rates will be promptly provided, even where the carriage is not at first profitable, and then when the carriage has become sufficiently profitable to attract and engage private capital, and engage it in abundance, the Government ought to withdraw.

The reason urged by the President is that we should take advantage of the opportunity offered us to increase our trade with South America now that the European countries are no longer in a position to supply them with goods. So far as the President is concerned, it is merely a means to increase our South American trade, thereby stimulating our industries to greater activity, and he proceeds on the assumption that there are now no ships which can carry our products to these markets. The senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] has shown, however, that ships now sail regularly for South America, and that very often they are compelled to sail with only half a cargo. If the ships at present engaged in the South American trade do not always get a full cargo, how is it going to encourage the trade to put on a few more ships, even though the additional ships are owned by the Government? And, so far as the upbuilding of our merchant marine is concerned, it is not clear to me how the placing in commission of several ships owned by the Government is to have any such result.

The President speaks of "the many mistakes by which we have discouraged and all but destroyed the merchant marine of the country" and "the steps by which we have, it seems almost deliberately, withdrawn our flag from the seas," but he does not explain what those mistakes were or what is necessary in order to retrace those steps. It is evident that he refers to past legislation, but in that event it would seem necessary to repeal or amend the obnoxious laws which he holds responsible for the destruction of our merchant marine. If those laws still continue in force, it is to be expected that they will have the same effect in the future as in the past, and if the President is correct in holding them responsible for the decline in our shipping, it is not clear to me how the operation of Government-owned ships will nullify the effect of the law so far as privately owned ships are concerned.

The President did not state what laws he had in mind which had all but destroyed our merchant marine. The Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo, appears to take a little different view of the matter. He says in his speech delivered in Chicago the 9th of January:

Much has been said about changing our navigation laws in such manner as to make the field for private capital more attractive. It is said that our navigation laws are so unfavorable and put American shipowners at such a disadvantage that unless they are changed in numerous particulars it will be impossible ever to build up an American merchant marine. * * * It is not, however, practicable to change our navigation laws to the extent which private capital demands, because the principal change relates to the wages of the American sailor.

It is stated that the wage standard for American labor makes the cost of operating American ships so much greater than the cost of operating the ships of other nations that it is impossible for the American shipowner to compete with his foreign rivals. This may be overstatement, but whether it is or not, I think it can be said with certainty that public opinion in this country will never permit the passage of any legislation that will reduce the American sailor to the standard of the Asiatic and European sailor.

If the President is right in his statement that our laws have all but destroyed our merchant marine, and if the Secretary of the Treasury is correct in stating that the principal change demanded in order that private capital may build up our merchant marine relates to the wages of the American sailor, I do not see any ground for the expectation of the President that the passage of this bill would result in attracting private capital into the shipping business. It can be stated with certainty that Congress will pass no legislation to lower the wages of American seamen, and I do not believe that it is the expectation of the supporters of this measure that the establishment of a Government-owned line of ships will result in lowering the wages. If, as shipowners maintain, the cost of operating vessels under the American flag is so much greater than under a foreign flag that it can not be done with profit, how is the fact that the Government owns a few merchant ships going to change this fact? And, on the other hand, if the shipowners are not correct in their contention, if it is possible to operate vessels under the American flag with profit and there are other reasons for our failure to build up a merchant marine, what change would the purchase or construction of a few ships by the Government make in this regard? I can see how a person might support this measure if he believes that there is a scarcity of ships to carry our products abroad which can be remedied only by purchase of ships by the Government, and I can also see how a person might support this measure believing that the only merchant marine which we can have until conditions radically change is one owned by the Government, but I do not see how it can be supported on the ground advanced by the President.

It is of interest at this point to note what the Secretary of the Treasury, S. P. Chase, said in regard to the decline in our shipping in a special report made to the Senate in 1864. He first describes the rise of American shipping:

The United States began an extraordinarily extended and unusually successful commercial career very soon after the establishment of the Government. The condition of Europe for a long period was such that American shipping became of necessity the preferred channel for conducting far the larger share of the commerce of the world. We were not limited to the carriage of merchandise of American production abroad and the return of foreign articles required in our own consumption, but for a series of years entered at and again exported from our ports a larger aggregate of values on account of foreign nations than for the entire use of the United States.

It could not, of course, be expected that with the most rapid and successful development of the United States this ascendency in general commerce would be maintained, but the facilities obtained by a preoccupation of extensive and profitable lines of trade between countries possessing no commercial marine directly, and also between these and the commercial and manufacturing States which are their permanent natural markets, should have secured to the shipping of the United States an equal division of all trade between noncommercial States and a share of the carrying trade wherever exclusion by positive legislation does not exist. Still more decidedly should the control of all carrying trade to our own markets have been retained, and the increased consumption of the products of tropical countries necessarily attending on the growth and increasing wealth of the United States might reasonably be supposed to give employment almost exclusively to American shipping. * * *

The large values of foreign merchandise exported from the United States, which are given in detail in another place, necessarily imply the employment of a great amount of American tonnage, since very little of the carrying trade between neutral nations could be in the hands of any belligerent power, and nearly all Europe was long involved in war. Even after the peace of 1815 there were intervals of disturbance, and frequent occasions in which the carrying trade was largely resumed by our shipping.

He then goes on to discuss the gradual passing of the carrying trade into the hands of other nations during the period from 1821 to 1863.

During this period of 42 years there was no marked event in the history of the United States to affect the progressive advance in general trade. It is evident, however, that not only was the foreign carrying trade steadily passing from our shipping to other hands, but also the direct commerce of the United States with all other countries was steadily encroached upon, each year adding a greater number of foreign than of American vessels to the general commercial marine.

Dealing with the causes of this condition, he says:

It may be stated that the loss of the great carrying trade conducted by American shipping during the European wars has more than once received earnest public attention. Two or three European States, and particularly France, almost immediately on the establishment of peace built up a severe system of discriminations against all other shipping than their own. These discriminations were carried to a most injurious length and were the subject of earnest remonstrance. The effect of the action of France is still seen in the remarkably limited amount of our present direct trade with that country, and for other States the results are quite as striking. In a forcible memorial addressed to Congress by the Chamber of Commerce of New York in 1821, the first decisively adverse effects of the new policy of European States is thus stated:

"It is a lamentable fact that more than half the number of vessels lately arrived at this from foreign ports are dismantled, from the absolute absence of any advantageous object of commercial pursuit; and this state of commerce seems the natural and necessary result of the new order of things which has prevailed since the pacification of Europe. Every restraint that lately shackled the navigation of the principal maritime nations of Europe has been removed, whilst the general trade and navigation of those States are, at the same time, regulated with a studious regard to the interests of their own subjects, so that the United States have not only ceased to be the carriers for Europe but are deprived of the means of entering into a fair competition in the transportation to foreign countries of the principal products of their own soil."

This is a just statement of the adverse action of France, more particularly, by which the United States shipping was first seriously curtailed of its due share of foreign trade. The discriminations then made by France were not in the form of tonnage dues and port charges so much as in specific charges imposed upon American produce imported in American ships.

Regarding the action of the British Government, he says:

The action of the British Government in the same direction was even more frequent and persistent, and though interrupted or in other ways rendered nugatory previous to the peace of 1815, the purpose was frequently and distinctly declared. In January, 1791, the British Board of Trade, in a formal report on commercial relations with the United States, announced the policy of giving signal privileges in British home ports to American ships, but refusing all such equality in the ports of the colonies.

"If Congress should propose that this principle of equality should be extended to the ports of our colonies and islands, and that ships of the United States should be there treated as British ships, it should be answered that this demand can not be admitted even as a subject of negotiation.

"Many vesels now go from the ports of Great Britain carrying British manufactures to the United States; there load with lumber and provisions for the British Islands, and return with the produce of those islands to Great Britain. This whole branch of the trade may be regarded as a new acquisition, and was attained by your Majesty's orders in council before mentioned."

Various countervailing acts of the United States aided to neutralize this policy, as has been said, until after the general peace of Europe in 1815. In a commercial convention with England, concluded July 3, 1815, the United States conceded the chief point in controversy, trusting to the great development of our trade with the British colonies, and the energy with which it had been conducted, to maintain it under any circumstances. The United States agreed to the equalization of all the conditions of their commerce with the British European ports, but left the regulations controlling trade with the British West Indies and American colonies without stipulation. The consequences were soon felt. The British authorities reestablished their old colonial policy, and shut American shipping from the West Indian ports.

The Secretary also calls attention to the greater subsidies paid the British steamships, to which some importance is attached. He ascribed the decline not to any of our laws, but to the restrictions which other nations imposed on our shipping in order to encourage their own. During the years to which he refers there was not an actual decline in the tonnage of our merchant marine engaged in foreign trade—there was usually an increase every year—but each year saw a larger percentage of our commerce carried in foreign bottoms than the preceding year. The Civil War appears to have caused a loss of approximately a million tons, the tonnage engaged in foreign trade in 1861 being given by the Commissioner of Navigation as 2,496,894 and in 1864 as 1,486,749. For a number of years thereafter it appears to have been almost stationary. In the seventies there was a gradual increase, the highest figure being reached in 1878, when 2,855 vessels, with a total tonnage of 1,589,348, were registered. From that year there was a gradual decrease until 1898, when 1,084 vessels, with a tonnage of 726,213, were registered. From 1898 there has been a slow increase until in 1914 we had 2,360 vessels, with a tonnage of 1,066,288. These figures deal only with vessels engaged in the foreign trade and do not include those in the coasting trade. In 1821, 88.7 per cent of our foreign trade was carried in American bottoms; in 1861 this had declined to 65.2 per cent; it fell to 27.5 per cent in 1864; it rose to a little over 35 per cent in 1868 and again in 1870; then it declined steadily until it reached 8.2 per cent in 1901; it gradually rose again to 12.1 per cent in 1905; and since that year has again declined until in 1914 the percentage of our foreign trade carried in American vessels was 8.6. The total value of our commerce carried in American vessels in 1821 was, in round numbers, $113,000,000; this gradually increased to somewhat more than $507,000,000 in 1860; in 1865 it had decreased to $167,000,000; the value increased again to $353,000,000 in 1870 and again in 1871; it fluctuated between $300,000,000 and $350,000,000 until 1879, when it fell to $272,000,000; it gradually declined to $160,000,000 in 1899, and then slowly increased until in 1914 it was somewhat more than $368,000,000.

Just on what the President bases his hope that if this bill is passed and Government ships are put in commission, private capital will then be induced to build up our merchant marine, is not apparent to me. It is true that during the period of the decline of our merchant marine private capital in this country has been abundantly and profitably employed in opening up a large section of our country, in building our great railway systems, and in building up our other industries. This may have had some effect in retarding efforts to rehabilitate our merchant marine. That this is not the only reason, however, is evidenced by the fact that considerable American capital is invested in ships flying foreign flags. If, as has often been stated, the main reason is that cost of operation under the American flag is so much greater than under other flags that our shipowners can not for that reason compete with foreign shipowners, then the only way in which we shall ever get a foreign merchant marine will be by paying for it, in the form of subsidies or by operating Government-owned vessels at a loss or by paying higher rates on goods shipped in American vessels. The Underwood Tariff Act undertook to do this by discriminatory duties on goods shipped in foreign bottoms, but because of our treaties with other countries this provision can not be enforced. It is hardly necessary to point out that that was only an indirect subsidy. We have hitherto been content to leave the matter as it is, reflecting that if foreign Governments by the payment of subsidies make it impossible for our shipowners to compete successfully in the ocean carrying trade, we are to some extent compensated by the cheaper ocean rates.

While the President urged the passage of this bill in order to encourage trade with South America and attract private capital into the shipping trade—and I suppose this is the real reason why such a desperate attempt is made to pass it, as such attempt would not be made unless the President insisted on it—the arguments now urged are mostly that there is an absolute lack of ships to transport our goods to other countries, and that the shipowners have taken advantage of the present conditions to increase the rates. So far as the latter contention is concerned, I believe it to be a fact that the rates are at this time higher than they have been formerly. Ocean rates, however, are subject to violent fluctuations, and I understand that they are uniformly higher in the winter than in summer. While the higher rates have been severely condemned on this floor, I do not know that any attempt has been made to find out to what extent they are justified. It must be remembered that the dangers to which navigation is exposed at this time, the higher insurance rates, the reported congestion of freight at the docks in Europe, resulting in long delays in unloading, would naturally result in increasing the ocean rates. I do not mean to say that there have not been unwarranted increases in ocean rates—I do not have any data at hand which would warrant me in making a statement either way—but the mere fact that rates have increased is not in itself necessarily proof of their unreasonableness.

The war has resulted in diminishing the merchant marine of the world by practically all of the German shipping. That does not necessarily mean, however, that we are now short of carrying facilities for our commerce to the extent in which our goods were formerly carried in German ships. It must be remembered that with the industries of the great commercial countries of Europe paralyzed the commerce of the world can be carried in fewer ships than formerly. During August, the first month of the war, our exports fell off greatly, being but $110,000,000 in round numbers, as against $154,000,000 in July. They increased to $156,000,000 in September, to $194,000,000 in October, and to $205,000,000 in November; the exports in November, 1913, were of the value of $245,000,000. For December a statement given to the papers last week shows that the exports regained the figures of December a year ago, which were in round numbers of the value of $233,000,000. I wish to insert at this point a clipping from the Washington Star containing the statement referred to:

SHOWING OF EXPORTS IN DECEMBER REPORT—DECREASE IN FINISHED PRODUCTS OFFSET BY GAINS IN MANUFACTURED FOODSTUFFS.

December, 1914, exports of manufactures regained the level shown by December of the preceding year, a decrease of 10 per cent in finished manufactures being more than offset by the gains in manufactured foodstuffs.

In certain lines of manufactures, however, the exports during the month of December, 1914, show phenomenal gains over those of December a year earlier, as, for example, in the case of commercial automobiles, the value of which advanced from $101,000 to more than $3,000,000; cotton knit goods, from $295,000 to more than $2,000,000; woolen clothing, from $183,000 to one and one-third million dollars; other woolen goods, including blankets, from $103,000 to more than $2,000,000, and rubber boots and shoes, from $84,000 to $864,000.

DEALINGS IN MANUFACTURES.

Europe is taking an unusually large proportion of the manufactures now being exported from the United States. Of the four and one-third million dollars' worth of automobiles, including both passenger and commercial vehicles, exported during the month of December, 1914, two and one-half million dollars' worth went to France and $1,000,000 worth to the United Kingdom. Those two countries also took practically all of the metal-working machinery, and England a preponderating proportion of the sole leather exported. Denmark was the chief market for the cottonseed oil cake and meal exported, and England and the Netherlands were the chief markets for the cottonseed oil which left the country during the month of December. Practically all of the 74,000,000 pounds of sugar exported during December went to France, and England and France were the chief destinations of woolen clothing, blankets, and other manufactures exported during the month to the value of more than $4,000,000.

It appears probable to me that the decrease in our exports was due to the disorganization of the industrial and commercial systems of the great countries of Europe on the sudden outbreak of the war rather than to a lack of ships to carry our trade. I think the case of Canada will illustrate this point. In September, 1913, our exports to Canada were almost $31,000,000; in September, 1914, not quite $26,000,000, or a falling off of $5,000,000. This certainly can not be attributed to a lack of ships. In October, 1913, their value was $33,000,000; in October, 1914, $23,500,000, or a falling off of nine and a half million dollars. In November, 1913, they had a value of $30,500,000; in November, 1914, $23,500,000, or a decline of more than $7,000,000. We certainly can not attribute this to a lack of ships. Our exports to Canada for the three months named were in 1913, in round numbers, $94,000,000; for the same months in 1914 they had a value of $73,000,000, or a falling off of $21,000,000. The decline of our actual trade with Canada was perhaps greater than these figures indicate, as there were great increases in such items as horses and wheat, which it is reasonable to presume were really destined for Europe. At any rate, the falling off in our trade with Canada can not be ascribed to a lack of ships, but must be due to the decrease of her industrial activities caused by the war. And as there can be no comparison between what Canada has suffered in this respect and what the European countries must have suffered, we must expect that the demand of Europe for our goods, other than foodstuffs and such material as is of use in war, will be less than it has been in former years.

While there was a decrease in our exports generally during the first part of the present fiscal year, a great increase is shown in the export of certain commodities. During the months of September, October, and November, 1914, we exported 47,308 horses as against 4,696 for the same months in 1913. During the months, September, October, November, and December, 1914, we exported 10,285,732 bushels of barley as against 1,805,862 bushels during the same months in 1913.

During the same months in 1914 we exported 9,137,702 bushels of corn, as against 2,291,716 bushels for the same months in 1913. We exported 32,402,048 bushels of oats during the same months in 1914, as against 410,859 bushels in 1913. Of wheat, we exported during the same months in 1914, 83,505,446 bushels, as against 28,983,592 bushels in 1913; almost three times as much, and yet there are plenty of ships to carry this tremendous amount of merchandise and foodstuffs. In the export of flour there does not appear to have been much change, 4,081,533 barrels during September, October, and November, 1914, and 3,774,110 during the same months the preceding year. I do not happen to have the figures for flour for December at hand. During the same three months in 1914 we also exported 4,148,392 bushels of rye and 22,980,331 pounds of rice, as against 219,105 bushels and 4,238,036 pounds, respectively, for the same months in 1913. If there is any congestion of traffic, which has been alleged but which has also been denied, at our ports, it appears to me that it might be due to the unprecedented demand for our foodstuffs. If this bill were to become a law and it should result in an addition to the shipping available for carrying our goods abroad, it is possible that when our available surplus of food products has been exported it would be found that our ships could get no cargo. For it must be expected that during the continuance of this war the demand of Europe for our goods, except foodstuffs and material useful in carrying on the war, will continue to be less than in former years. I wish to insert here a clipping from the Washington Star, showing the unusually large exports from New York at the present time:

NEW YORK TOTAL EXPORTS PAST WEEK, $23,526,602—BUSINESS TO DATE, 1915, EXCEEDS THAT OF SAME PERIOD LAST YEAR, IS REPORT.

NEW YORK, February 10.

Exports at this port in the week ending February 6 are officially placed at $23,526,602, compared with $26,272,091 in the week before, according to a customhouse statement made public to-day. This year's exports to date total $148,146,690, against $119,413,507 in the same period last year.

Germany's orders were larger than at any period since the European war began, shipments to that country totaling $1,670,202.

England's shipments for the week were valued at $4,486,815, and those of France aggregate $3,191,362; Italy's purchases, largely grain, totaled $2,238,834.

How completely the Mexican situation has disrupted New York's trade with Mexico is revealed in the statement that exports for the week were next to the lowest of any country reported, being only $1,380.

We needed no ships to transact business between the United States and Mexico. That decline was not due to a lack of ships.

As this statement shows, the exports from New York during January and the first week of February this year were almost $29,000,000 in excess of the exports for the same period in 1914, the totals being $148,146,690 and $119,413,507, respectively.

The industry which has suffered especially because of the war is, of course, the cotton-growing industry. According to the report of the Census Bureau, the exports of cotton during August, September, October, and November, 1914, were, in round numbers, 1,400,000 bales as against 4,200,000 bales during the same months in 1913. This was, of course, a tremendous decline—a decline of almost 300 per cent. In December, however, we exported 1,202,115 bales, and in the same month in 1913, 1,230,830 bales, only about 28,000 bales less than a year ago. I wish to insert at this point a table taken from the report of the Census Bureau showing the exports of cotton for December, 1914 and 1913, and also for the five months ending December 31, both years.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Exports of domestic cotton and linters (running bales).

	1914	1913	1914	1913
Total	1,202,115	1,230,830	2,607,164	5,437,480

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I read from a newspaper clipping, under date of February 6, the following:

BIGGEST UNITED STATES TRADE BALANCE—FOREIGN BUSINESS SHOWS RECORD WEEK IN FAVOR OF AMERICA.

Foreign trade for the week ended February 6, as reported to the Department of Commerce yesterday by the 13 principal customs ports, showed a balance of $37,134,226 in favor of the United States, the largest weekly balance on record.

Exports for the week totaled $59,581,106 and imports, $22,446,880.

Exports for the past 10 weeks totaled $519,350,295 and imports $244,006,550, making a balance of $275,343,745 in favor of the United States for that period.

Cotton exported during the week amounted to 365,733 bales, making the total for the last nine weeks 2,616,432.

It appears to me that in view of the present large exports, if there is any shortage of ships to carry our goods abroad, it is in all probability only a temporary condition, since our exports will probably decrease when we have sold our surplus foodstuffs.

Our direct trade with Germany, Austria, and Belgium, however, has practically ceased, and our direct trade with Russia has decreased very greatly. Our exports to some of their neighboring countries have greatly increased, however, and it is possible that some of these reach the countries with which we have at present almost no direct communication. For instance, comparing our exports in the months of September, October, and November, 1914, with the exports for the same months in the preceding year, to some of these countries I get the following results: To Denmark, 1913, $4,368,166; 1914, $24,459,314, an increase of $20,000,000 to that small country. To Greece, 1913, $268,340; 1914, $4,977,985. To Italy, 1913, $21,376,699; 1914, $32,473,259. To Norway, 1913, $2,533,824; 1914, $10,846,440. To Sweden, 1913, $4,445,577; 1914, $14,995,543, an increase of more than $10,000,000 to Sweden alone. In the case of Holland our trade shows a decrease, our exports being $23,999,032 for the three months of 1913 and $19,043,606 for the same months of 1914. While it is possible that some of our goods are reaching Germany indirectly, it would seem probable that we might sell her more goods if we had a line of American ships reaching her ports directly. The same might also be true of Russia. It might be a question, however, as to whether the fact that we have at present practically no ships plying between our ports and those of Germany and Russia may not be due less to an absolute lack of ships for this trade than to other causes. The reported danger of mines in the North Sea and adjacent waters, the proclaiming by England of the North Sea and that part of the North Atlantic Ocean lying east of a line drawn from the northern point of Scotland to Iceland as a military area or war zone, the danger of the capture and detention, if not confiscation, of the goods carried, and England's avowed intention to prevent even food products from reaching Germany, would all result in deterring shipowners from engaging in this trade.

The passage of this bill is at times urged as an emergency measure, as necessary in order to secure the ships necessary to carry our goods abroad. It may be doubted, however, whether it would result in increasing the number of ships available for the foreign trade. If the German and Austrian ships at present in our ports were purchased, it would, of course, have this result; but there might follow a decrease even more sudden than the increase, since, as we have seen, these ships would be in danger of capture by the English and French. If we leave these ships out of consideration, there remain only ships which either are now engaged in the ocean-carrying trade or which, it may be presumed, would engage in the foreign trade if the anticipated profits were such as to make the venture attractive. Our coasting fleet contains vessels large enough to engage in the foreign trade, and if the profits in such trade are now as large as some would have us believe, such vessels might be expected to enter this trade even while in private ownership. Moreover, if exorbitant profits are now being enjoyed by the shipowners, they would undoubtedly ask higher prices for their vessels than the Government would be warranted in paying. Such vessels as now sail under foreign flags and are owned by Americans can now register as American ships under the act passed last summer. Merely changing the ownership of ships from private to public will neither increase the number of ships nor their capacity. And as I think it safe to say that it requires at least one year to build a ship of this kind, there could be no immediate increase of our merchant marine if the ships were to be built. And I might further add that if it were to take the President as long to name the members of the shipping board as it took him to name the members of the Federal Reserve Board, or as long as it apparently is going to take to name the members of the Federal Trade Commission, this measure could not by any stretch of imagination be called an emergency measure.

It has also been urged that the ownership of these ships by the Government will give us a number of auxiliary cruisers. If the ships to be purchased or constructed were of the type of the fast passenger steamships, this might be true, but if they are to be of the type best suited for the economical carriage of freight—which I understand to be ships with a speed of 12 to 14 knots—they would be worthless as auxiliary cruisers. I may be mistaken in this. If I am mistaken, I should like to have the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] correct me or correct the RECORD.

I have here a letter from Dr. J. E. Boyle, professor of economics and political science in the University of North Dakota, in regard to this measure, which is of interest. Those of you who were here when the reciprocity treaty was pending before the Senate of the United States under the administration of President Taft will remember that Prof. Boyle was here as a witness, advocating reciprocity. I do not want to do Prof. Boyle an injustice, but my information is that he is a free-trade Democrat. I know that he is a great admirer, as we all are admirers, of President Wilson. I want to read the letter from Prof. Boyle. This letter is addressed to me under date of January 28, 1915:

UNIVERSITY OF NORTH DAKOTA,
Grand Forks, January 28, 1915.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. GRONNA: In regard to the ship-purchase bill, I have made a great many inquiries about the State as I have addressed farmers' clubs, and I have also talked to men on the street here and to a few advanced students who are recognized for their independent thinking. I may say that I find four classes of opinions on the subject, as follows:

First. A large class say that they are not informed at all on the subject and prefer to wait a few months or a year. They say there is no hurry; no use to do anything yet.

The second class, also a fairly good-sized class, say there is no pressing demand for ships, for there are ships enough now afloat to carry the world's trade, and if our Government should purchase ships it would merely be a "white elephant" on our hands. To purchase and operate such a fleet would be to tax all the people for the benefit of a few people.

The third class of people, who are interested especially in trade with Mexico and South America, say that other agencies must be created first before we secure ships. We must have our agents, with shops and warehouses, exhibition rooms, etc., in the various Latin-American countries, and build up an acquaintance with our goods and a demand for our goods. These critics also say the Government must extend protection to such persons and such property, and not do as the President did in the Mexican affair when trouble arose—tell them to get up and leave the country; that they would not be protected. The arguments of this class of critics, I think, are absolutely sound and impregnable.

The fourth class, who base their objections to the shipping bill on the grounds of the diplomatic complications involved. For instance, there are 8 German ships interned at Boston, 14 in Brooklyn, and others interned at other ports. This subject is now fully covered by international law. Should the United States purchase these ships, put them under the American flag, and send them out on the high seas, they would, of course, be subject to capture—and legally, too—by the British. This would undoubtedly lead to trouble, more or less, with England. I am inclined to attach considerable weight to this argument, especially in connection with the arguments mentioned above.

This rough classification, perhaps, does not include all classes of our citizens. I notice the papers, as the Herald, look at the problem largely on business grounds. If it has not paid private corporations to operate these ships, how can the Government do it successfully? It looks like a good opportunity for the Government to squander a lot of money in a field where business men keep out. It has not yet been demonstrated, so far as I know, that ships are lacking to carry all the goods that are bought and sold. The market is lacking, which must be developed through the long preparatory course mentioned above. We still lack banking and credit arrangements with these prospective customers.

And for the proposition, I may say that I fail to find anyone with convictions at the present time. Not one person that I have met has come out for the shipping bill.

Very ardent Wilson supporters have declined to take any live interest in the bill; as mentioned in case No. 1 above, they are not informed, and think they had better wait a while and not rush into something new and untried. It has points not only of economic but of political disaster as well.

This states the case very briefly but, I think, fairly accurately, as I sense it in this section of the country. I may say I have taken very keen interest in it myself, and have secured all the information I could get. Indeed, the shipping question has been one of special study with me since I first wrote a discussion of it at length in the year 1901.

Sincerely, yours,

JAMES E. BOYLE.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that the words of Prof. Boyle are worthy of serious consideration.

Mr. President, the statement has been made on this floor by a member of the majority that not more than one-half of the Democratic Senators are really in favor of this measure. The statement has also been made on this floor that in the Democratic caucus on this bill it received only 35 votes. That is about one-third of the membership of the Senate. And yet the bill is to be forced through. Why? Because the President wants it. Tuesday's papers contain an account of how a very distinguished gentleman secured the adoption of the bill by the caucus of another body. Why? Because the President wants it.

Mr. President, it appears to me that we shall soon reach a condition of affairs where one Senator with President Wilson will constitute a majority of the Senate, and where one Member of the House with the President will constitute a majority of the House. I have in former years expressed my views on the President's arrogating to himself powers rightfully belonging to Congress, and my views have not changed with the changing of administrations. Some four years ago President Taft secured the passage of the Canadian reciprocity act. In the course of the debate on that measure I said:

The Members of both Houses of Congress, as well as the people at large, have been in the habit of considering that the lawmaking power is lodged in Congress, and that the President has merely the veto power. We have assumed that when the Constitution stated this in plain words it meant just that. Now that this important measure is before us, however, a majority of the Members of the two Houses of Congress cheerfully acquiesce in the assumption of the President that he is the real lawmaking as well as the treaty-making body, and that the Congress has merely the veto power, and that even this veto power should not be exercised free from pressure by the administration. * * * The President has apparently come to the conclusion that he represents the people of this country both as Executive and Legislature, and that the two Houses of Congress are merely two bodies of men provided for by the Constitution, which he can unfortunately not get rid of, but which are to be ignored and coerced whenever he deems it necessary or expedient.

This was a criticism which I made when Mr. Taft was President of the United States.

Mr. President, these words would be mild censure if applied to the present occupant of the presidential chair. When I last read the Constitution, which the President, as well as the Members of the Senate, has taken a solemn oath to uphold and defend, it contained this provision, and the importance which the framers of the Constitution attached to it may be judged from the fact that it is section 1 of Article I:

All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and a House of Representatives.

It does not say that the legislative powers shall be vested in the President, who may allow Congress to ratify his acts. It does not mention the Democratic caucus, whose mandate no Democrat can disregard without being accused of party treason and disloyalty to the President. We have within the last two weeks been treated to severe denunciations of Senators who, having convictions of their own, had the courage thereof; and only last month the President, in a public speech, threatened with condign punishment any Democrats who should attempt in any way to interfere with the work of the Democratic "team," of which he considered himself captain. If it had not been the intention when the Constitution was framed to give the Senate and the House the power to frame the laws, if it had not been the intention to impose this responsibility on them, there would have been no need of these bodies. If the Congress is to do merely the clerical work in connection with legislation, if the real directing force is to be some power outside of the two Houses, if the legislative department of this Government is to do merely as the executive department directs, there is no need of a legislative department. A drafting bureau, or, at most, a small council selected by the President and liable to removal by him, would do the work as well, in less time, and with less friction. The Constitution imposes the duty of legislation on Congress, vests Congress with the power, and with the power must of necessity be the responsibility. For the way in which each Member of either House performs his duties he is answerable to the people whom he is here to represent. He is not responsible to any caucus for his words and his acts; neither is he responsible to the President or the Postmaster General for the way in which he performs his duties. A Senator may vote in accordance with the dictates of the President or with the instructions of a secret caucus; but when he comes before the bar of public opinion he will find that he individually will be held responsible for his votes and that, although he may voluntarily have surrendered the powers of legislation intrusted to him, he can not divest himself of the responsibility accompanying those powers.

Mr. President, to show that I am not the only one who maintains that legislative power is vested in the Congress I wish to read a letter from one of the foremost citizens of this country, one who only a year or so ago was a Member of this body. The letter is dated February 2, 1915, and is addressed to Hon. MILES POINDEXTER, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

FEBRUARY 2, 1915.

Hon. MILES POINDEXTER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Permit me to congratulate you as one of our consistent advocates of truly popular and representative government in your cooperation with other Republican Senators and a few independent Democrats in rebuking the President's unjustifiable efforts to dictate to Congress what legislation shall be enacted.

From a fundamental standpoint of government yesterday's vote on recommitment of the shipping bill is the most important action taken by the present Congress, for it is a declaration to the country at large of the legislative independence of Congress, the only branch of our Government directly elected by and directly accountable to the people of this country.

Before entering upon the duties of his office the President of the United States took an oath pledging himself to "preserve, protect, and defend" the Constitution of the United States. Section 1, Article I, of that Constitution declares:

"All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives."

It is frequently stated that certain legislation will be enacted because it is the wish of the President, and that other legislation will not be enacted because the President is opposed to it.

The entire spirit and letter of the Constitution shows clear intention that Congress shall be free from intimidation; that it was the purpose that Congress should make the laws and that the President should execute them. Indeed section 6 of Article I declares that for any speech or debate in Congress Members shall not be questioned in any other place. While it is not permitted that Members be punished by fine or imprisonment for speech or debate in Congress, yet it has been charged that Presidents have rewarded or punished Members of Congress through the distribution of patronage.

If the legislative power vested in a Senate and House of Representatives is to be exercised honestly and intelligently, the Members of the two Houses must be free to vote in accordance with their own best judgment, being held accountable only to the people of their own State. Any interference with the free expression of the opinion of Members of Congress by their votes upon measures is a direct attack upon that section of the Constitution which declares that—

"All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives."

This quotation is a part of that Constitution which every President of the United States has taken an oath to "preserve, protect, and defend." No President can interfere with the exercise of legislative power by Congress without violating his oath of office, a violation as direct and as complete as any other unlawful act by any other officer of the Government. No individual that has ever lived or that ever will live is qualified to be despotic ruler of 100,000,000 people.

I read with much interest Mr. Samuel G. Blythe's interview with President Wilson, appearing in the Saturday Evening Post of January 9, 1915, and was particularly impressed with the following declaration made by President Wilson:

"I may be lonely because of the necessities of my place; but my vision is clearer than it would be were I surrounded by a group—any group—of well-meaning and zealous friends with interests of their own."

An analysis of this statement reveals three of Mr. Wilson's great weaknesses:

First. Accentuated egotism in the assumption that he knows it all and can learn nothing from anyone.

Second. Acknowledged timidity and lack of confidence in his own judgment and ability because he is afraid he would be influenced by others should he talk with them.

Third. A clearly expressed suspicion that his friends are less patriotic than he and more likely to be guided by self-interest.

No man with such ideas is qualified to be dictator over 100,000,000 or any other number of people.

Cordially, yours, JONATHAN BOURNE, Jr.

Mr. President, there are times when it may seem that established bureaucracy and Executive interference marks the beginning of the destruction of our democracy and the usefulness of Congress as a legislative body. But let us not forget that these positions are only temporarily held by men selected by the people as servants to carry out their will; but if that is not done, the people have a complete remedy and they will use it at the proper time. I believe, sir, that the people of this Government will not permit any individual, no matter how high a position he may hold, to override the Constitution of our country.

Mr. FLETCHER and Mr. SMOOT addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration——

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield for just a moment? There are a number of Senators who are absent and who did not expect to be in the Chamber until half an hour or so from this time. I merely wish to suggest the absence of a quorum, not for delay, but that they may be here.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand, but let me state my motion first. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 5259 and the amendments of the House thereto. Now the Senator can call for a quorum.

Mr. SMOOT. Now I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to laying the bill before the Senate?

Mr. SMOOT. No.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then the bill is before the Senate, and the Secretary will call the roll for a quorum.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gore	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Gronna	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Borah	Hardwick	Norris	Smith, Mich.
Brady	Hollis	O'Gorman	Smoot

Fletcher	McCumber	Sherman
Gallinger	McLean	Shields
Goff	Martin, Va.	Simmons

Mr. VARDAMAN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] on account of illness.

Mr. WHITE. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is absent and is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I had expected at this time to address the Senate at some length in support of the House amendments to the Senate bill and the bill as it comes from the House, but in view of the fact that it seems entirely probable that the measure can now be referred without further discussion to conferees I shall not take up the time of the Senate to carry out my original purpose.

I wish, however, to put into the RECORD a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury pointing out the vessels that he considers within reach of the company to be organized under the bill, and also giving the status of the War Insurance Bureau.

I wish also to add a statement of the policies issued by the War Risk Insurance Bureau, the insurance carried by it, the premiums received, and the earned premiums up to the present time, and to add in addition a statement showing the cotton exportations from August to February 17, beginning in 1913 and 1914.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 9, 1915.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In reply to your verbal inquiry:

1. I am advised that cargo ships can be built in English shipyards at $50 per ton dead-weight capacity, and that the same ships can be built in American shipyards at $65 per ton dead-weight capacity. Eighty ships of 5,000 tons dead-weight capacity each could be built in English shipyards for $20,000,000; 61 ships, at $65 per ton dead-weight capacity, could be built in American shipyards for a little less than $20,000,000, or a total of 141 ships of 5,000 tons dead-weight capacity could be built within $40,000,000. I am advised also that probably 100,000 tons dead-weight capacity could be turned out in American shipyards within 12 months, and that probably 200,000 tons dead-weight capacity could be turned out in British shipyards within 6 months, and that probably 100,000 tons dead-weight capacity could be turned out in British shipyards within 90 days after receipt of orders. We are offered ships of various registry—English, French, Italian, Norwegian, Swedish, and Danish—the price depending largely upon their age. They are being sold, I am told, at from $30 to $50 per ton dead-weight capacity. Many ships could undoubtedly be bought, so that it would not be necessary to depend wholly upon American and foreign shipyards for vessels if the shipping bill should pass.

2. As to war-risk insurance, I send you a statement, dated February 9th, from Mr. J. Brooks B. Parker, assistant director (marked Exhibit 1), containing information which I think you will find of interest and showing that the $5,000,000 of working capital granted to the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance by Congress is a very small part of the capital invested in private corporations engaged in marine and war risk insurance business. Notwithstanding this fact, the rates made by the Government War-Risk Insurance Bureau have had a potential, if not dominating, influence upon the rates made by all companies on war-risk insurance. The Government War-Risk Insurance Bureau is the only one that will insure any ship to Germany. This has enabled us to send cotton cargoes to German ports. The Assistant Director of the War-Risk Insurance Bureau says that before the Government engaged in this business the rates charged by private corporations were almost prohibitive, running as high as from 25 to 30 per cent for risks through the North Sea, 10 per cent to South American points, and from 15 to 20 per cent to India or the Far East.

I also inclose a memorandum showing the number of policies, total amount insured, the premiums collected, and the premiums earned to February 15, Bureau of War-Risk Insurance. From this you will see that there have been issued 872 policies; that the total amount insured was $54,100,031; total amount of premiums collected, $1,437,425.09; premiums actually earned to date (on expired risks), $584,747.34. The total cost of conducting the bureau since its creation has been approximately $7,000. No losses have yet been incurred.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The shipping bill which has passed the House is a substantial improvement upon any of the bills heretofore considered by the Senate. It permits the shipping corporation to handle the ships as an emergency measure during the European war and for two years thereafter. Then the ships are to be turned over to the Secretary of the Navy. Those immediately required by the Navy will be used as a part of the Navy. The Secretary of the Navy, with the approval of the President, can establish one or more mail lines to South America and to Europe. It is perfectly clear that the mail lines which are to be operated by the Navy Department should not use, under the plan of the bill, any large number of the vessels which are to be purchased. The balance of the vessels the Secretary of the Navy, with the approval of the President, can lease out to individuals, firms, and corporations for use as merchant vessels.

This shipping bill deserves support for three reasons:

First. It will meet the great emergency brought about by the war which has made it difficult to obtain ships for our foreign commerce and has increased so much the cost of shipping. The importance of this commerce will be realized when we remember that for the year ending July 1, 1914, it amounted to $3,750,000,000.

Second. This bill will furnish a splendid addition to our Navy, for the vessels, even when leased for merchant shipping, are to be subject to requisition for naval and military purposes.

Third. It will stimulate the development of our merchant marine, both through the mail routes established and through the vessels leased for freight transportation. I shall defer a discussion of the subject until a later date.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I believe the pending question is the motion of the Senator from Florida to refer the pending shipping bill to conferees.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is on disagreeing to the House amendments.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand that the motion to take up the bill has been declared carried.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. The bill being before the Senate, I desire to make a motion——

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have the floor. I desire to offer an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment of the House as follows:

Amend section 9 of the amendment of the House as follows:

Strike out all of said section after the word "except," in line 6, and substitute in lieu thereof the following:

"All vessels purchased or constructed under the provisions of this act shall be entitled to engage in the coastwise trade of the United States."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. BANKHEAD. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). During the temporary absence of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] I am paired with him and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] and vote "yea."

Mr. WHITE (when the name of Mr. SMITH of South Carolina was called). I am requested to announce the absence of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and to state that he is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LIPPITT. I have a general pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I presume, if present, he would vote "yea" on this question. I should also vote "yea"; but as I am not sure of that position, I will withhold my vote.

Mr. OLIVER (after having voted in the negative). I voted, not knowing that my pair was absent from the Chamber. I have a general pair with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. CUMMINS. I desire to announce the necessary absence of the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. As has been stated, he is paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

The result was announced—yeas 38, nays 40, as follows:

YEAS—38.

So the motion to lay Mr. BANKHEAD's amendment on the table was rejected.

Mr. STONE and Mr. LEA of Tennessee addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, the question now before the Senate is the amendment to admit vessels purchased under the pending bill, if passed, to the coastwise trade, is it not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I do not rise primarily to discuss the amendment, but to take advantage of the opportunity it affords me to obtain the floor that I may read an interesting item which I find in the Washington Post of this morning. It is as follows:

COL. LILLARD A SUICIDE—BOLTED DEMOCRATIC PARTY TO HELP ELECT SENATOR W. O. BRADLEY.

DANVILLE, KY., February 17.

Col. E. W. Lillard, who gained Nation-wide notoriety six years ago when he deserted the ranks of the Democrats and supported the late Senator W. O. Bradley, Republican, in his race for the United States Senate, committed suicide in the attic of his residence here this afternoon.

DESERTED BY OLD FRIENDS.

At the time of the famous Bradley-Beckham race for the Senate, Col. Lillard bolted with three other Democrats from Beckham to Bradley, and this action resulted in the election of Bradley to the Senate. Shortly after Col. Lillard was appointed private secretary to the late Senator. When Senator Bradley died Col. Lillard returned to his old home. Old acquaintances turned from him on account of his bolting his party. He was almost friendless.

For several weeks he had been despondent. He was 55 years old.

Two thousand years ago, in the garden of Gethsemane, Judas betrayed Christ with a kiss. Six years ago Col. Lillard, who had long been a respected citizen of Boyle County, Ky., was elected by the Democrats to the legislature. There he forgot or ignored the pledges and obligations he was under, forsook his party and aided in defeating it at an important juncture. We all know what became of Judas, and we now know what became of Lillard.

Mr. President, I call attention to this incident for the purpose of showing that there is a Nemesis that always pursues or walks by the side of men like Judas and Lillard. My chief purpose in calling attention to it is that it may serve as an impressive lesson for moralists and teachers in instructing the young who come under their tutelage and guidance as to the value and virtue of fidelity.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. STONE. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. Does the Senator from Missouri think that the Republicans who voted to elect at least two Democratic Senators to this body, and perhaps more, ought also to commit suicide?

Mr. STONE. To whom does the Senator from New Hampshire refer?

Mr. GALLINGER. I said at least two Democratic Senators to this body.

Mr. STONE. I do not know to whom the Senator refers.

Mr. JAMES. But, Mr. President, if the Senator from Missouri will pardon me, there is this difference between those men who were individual voters, to whom the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] refers, and Mr. Lillard. I did not care to say anything about this, and had no thought that the Senator from Missouri would do so. Mr. Lillard, when he ran for the legislature, was pledged to support Gov. Beckham. I spoke in his home town. He was present. I advocated his election as a Democratic nominee, and stated that he had authorized me to say that if he should be elected he would support Gov. Beckham as the Democratic nominee, who had been nominated in a State-wide primary for the United States Senate. Mr. Lillard himself rose in the audience and said that was true; that he would support Gov. Beckham as the nominee of the party.

Now, there is quite a difference between a Republican or a Democrat casting his own vote for whomsoever his choice may be and one who accepts a trust upon the condition that he would carry it out in good faith; and that was the situation with Mr. Lillard. He was the trustee of an express trust, which was to support Gov. Beckham.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Missouri will permit me——

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I must decline to enter upon a political discussion. My purpose, as I have stated, is to use this significant, tragic, and impressive incident with the hope that it might be taken up and employed by the teachers of the young—

To point a moral or adorn a tale.

I did not want the incident to be lost by a passing notice in a great newspaper. So tragic a thing as this can be utilized to good advantage in impressing a very important lesson on the minds of the rising generation.

Mr. President, speaking now to the immediate matter before the Senate, I desire to say, what I have frequently said on the floor of this body, that, if I could, I would admit American ships, American registered vessels, whether made in the United States or elsewhere, if they are owned in the United States and rightly fly our flag, to the coastwise trade. The monopoly of the coastwise business is one I should like to break up; but, Mr. President, every Senator here knows that this amendment was introduced, as other like amendments can be introduced, for at least two purposes—one with the hope of embarrassing Senators on this side who think about the coastwise shipping business as I do, but, primarily and chiefly, with the hope of loading down the bill with amendments that would still further obstruct its passage.

I do not know—and therefore do not assert—whether the distinguished Senator who offered the amendment would vote for this amendment if it were separately presented to the Senate; in other words, whether seriously he favors it. I do not know as to that. I do know, as all of us do, that it is an old parliamentary trick to offer amendments with a view to embarrassing a pending measure which the Senators offering them do not seriously favor. We have seen that done time and again. I do not say that that is true in this case, for I do not know.

Mr. JAMES. Well, Mr. President, does the Senator from Missouri believe that the Senator who introduced the amendment, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], would support the pending House bill to its final passage with this amendment added to it?

Mr. STONE. I can only say as an expression of belief that the Senator from Alabama would not support the bill even with this amendment or any other amendment added to it that did not absolutely destroy its meaning and effect.

Mr. JAMES. I was going to suggest to the Senator that, in my judgment and my belief, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] would not support this bill with this amendment added to it, and the Senator——

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is not asking a question, Mr. President, and I rise to a point of order.

Mr. JAMES. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] is in the Chamber and he can speak for himself. If he would support this bill with this amendment added to it, I should like to have him say so.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will remind the Chair that I was taken off the floor yesterday because of what was ruled to be an infraction of the rules.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; the recent rigid rulings of the Senate have been that an interruption can only be for a question; otherwise, the Senator yields the floor.

Mr. STONE. Very well, Mr. President, I will observe the rule; I wish it enforced, and I yield the floor.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, referring to the historical parts of the comments of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] and their application, as I understood them as he went along, and as I presume others understood them, and as he doubtless intended everyone to understand them, I want to add, in a historical way, that in January, 1891, there was a matter pending before the Senate which had been pending for nearly two months—the force bill, so called—and there was in the Senate what was designated as a "filibuster." The Republicans at that time were in the majority, and, consequently, the Democrats in the minority. After a long discussion of the question six Republican Senators voted with the Democrats to displace the measure then before the body, the force bill, and take up the reapportionment bill. In looking over the history of that contest we are reminded that of the six Democrats all of them were reelected once and some twice or more times, with the single exception of one from Minnesota, who served six years afterwards; and while five of those Senators were reelected, I and also others who stood with those of the Republican Senators who undertook to force upon an unwilling public an obnoxious measure went out of the Senate; we failed to be reelected. I simply desired to make that addition to the Senator's historical statement.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Before the vote is taken on the pending question I desire to make a statement, which will probably not exceed two or three minutes.

It is well known that on several occasions I have endeavored to open the coastwise trade to vessels wherever built. I will welcome any opportunity to accomplish that end. In addition to what my colleague has just said, and adopting what he said with reference to this particular amendment, I want to add that the proposition to admit vessels to the coastwise trade is made by the Senator from Alabama, who has been one of the seven Democrats who have consistently and persistently refused to cooperate with the Democratic Party in passing this bill. With the help of those seven men, earnestly given, this bill could have been long since passed.

I now desire to say that if the seven Democrats who have acted with the Republicans will agree to support this bill with the pending amendment added, I shall vote for the amendment, and I think I can say that it will get unanimous Democratic support, or nearly so; and I desire to ask now if the seven, or any one of them, will rise in the Chamber and state that, with this amendment added, he will support the bill? I pause for a reply.

Mr. President, I make the further proposition, the one I just made not being accepted, that if three of the seven will rise and say they will support the bill with this amendment added, I shall vote for the amendment. I pause for a reply.

I desire to make the further proposition that if two of them will rise and say they will support the bill with this amendment added, I shall vote for the amendment. I pause for a reply.

I desire now to make this proposition, that if the Senator who offered the amendment [Mr. BANKHEAD] will rise in his seat and say that with this amendment added he will join with the rest of the Democrats to try and make this bill a law, I shall vote for his amendment.

I pause now to ascertain whether any of these distinguished Senators will give us their pledge.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. REED. In a moment. I am not making these propositions to place anyone in an unpleasant situation, but the time has arrived when we ought to know where we are standing. If this amendment is offered merely to place an additional obstacle in the way of the bill by an enemy of the bill who wants to thus defeat the bill, of course we ought to vote against it; but if it is offered in good faith to strengthen the bill and to bring it votes, if its author will stand on the floor of the Senate and say he will support the bill with that amendment added, I shall vote for it, and I think we will get enough votes for it on this side to pass it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. REED. In a moment I will. If there are five Senators on the other side of the Chamber who will agree to support this bill and join with us in passing it, I shall vote for this amendment; if there are four on the other side who will rise and say they will support this bill and stand for it and fight for it, I will agree to vote for the amendment; if there are three who will agree to stay with us and fight for this bill and stay here night and day to pass it, I will vote for this amendment. I pause for a reply.

I now yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I rise, Mr. President, to inquire of the Senator whether he knows of any Senator who has been supporting this bill who will vote against it, provided this amendment is adopted?

Mr. REED. I do not know. In the present situation I do not feel that it is safe to vote for the amendment, coming from the source it does. I respect the source personally, but I do not respect the source so far as his intentions toward this bill are concerned.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. I interrupt for the purpose of calling attention to the manner in which the vote upon the motion to lay upon the table was taken, as it is entirely appropriate to the subject matter of the remarks of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. THOMAS. During the roll call a great many votes upon the Republican side were recorded against laying this motion upon the table, until it was perfectly obvious that the motion would be defeated. It was then quite significant to see so many stalwart, stand-pat Republicans rise on the floor, obtain recognition, and announce that they had voted to table the bill, not to table the amendment, under a misapprehension, and therefore they desired to change their votes, it being evident that the motion was lost.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I was one of those who changed my vote, and I will say to the Senator from Colorado that I changed it in good faith. I did vote under a misapprehension. There were a couple of other Senators who made the same statement, and I presume they were equally as honest as I was.

Now, Mr. President, just a word. I think it unfortunate that the Senator from Missouri brought into the Senate this tragic incident that occurred on yesterday. It is not a very pleasant message to send to the family of that poor man. A great many other men have committed suicide, and their action had not any relation whatever to political matters; and I apprehend that if the facts in this case were known what that man did on a certain occasion very likely had nothing to do with the act he committed. I simply rose to say that much on that point.

As to the proposed amendment, there is no concealment on my part on the question of invading the coastwise shipping of the United States. It is prosperous, and it has recently given about 40 ships, steam and sail, to the over-seas service of the country and has rendered a great service. The business of domestic shipping is at the present time very much depressed because of the industrial situation; and under the circumstances it seems to me it would be a very unwise thing to adopt the amendment that has been offered by the Senator from Alabama. For that reason I shall vote against it, and I trust the majority of the Senate will vote against the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to say that while I am not in the habit of negotiating with the other side, and never have in 20 years, I believe, negotiated with them, and while I am not in the habit of negotiating with those on this side who think they are wiser than the school of politics to which they belong, I cordially indorse the proposition made by the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and will add my vote to his if the proposition made by him is accepted.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. BRYAN. The remarks of the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] imply that Democrats who voted against the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] were acting in bad faith toward the Democratic Party or toward the Democratic caucus. No such motives moved me. I had the privilege in the Democratic caucus of moving to change the language of the shipping bill so that ships owned by the Government of the United States should have an equal right in the harbors and along the coasts with ships owned by individual citizens of the United States. This is not the bill that was in the Democratic caucus, and I felt at perfect liberty to vote upon this motion of the Senator from Alabama as I chose to vote.

It is a humiliating thing, and it will be more humiliating to the Democratic Party if this bill becomes a law, for the citizens of the United States to contemplate the proposition that a vessel of the United States can not carry merchandise between the ports of the United States built up, improved, and maintained by the United States. If this bill becomes a law, the line of vessels running from Habana to New York City, while permitted to touch at the ports along the coast, at Key West, Jacksonville, Savannah, Charleston, and Norfolk, could not take on goods destined for the port of New York. It would suit me very much better if permission to do so could have been written into this bill.

The senior Senator from Missouri is mistaken in thinking that those of us who did not vote with him upon the motion of the Senator from Alabama can be compared to a traitor. Sir, usually the two Senators from Missouri are in accord; but immediately upon the conclusion of the speech of the senior Senator from Missouri the junior Senator from Missouri rose and stated that he would vote for this amendment if enough votes could be obtained to agree to the conference report on the final vote. I ask if the senior Senator from Missouri would like to characterize his colleague in the manner he undertook to characterize other Senators?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BRYAN. Not just now. When the junior Senator from Missouri took his seat, the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] rose, and said that he, too, felt at liberty to vote to sustain this proposition, notwithstanding any caucus that had taken place. Now, Mr. President, it is well known that the senior Senator from Mississippi and the junior Senator from Missouri have been among the most ardent advocates of the pending bill, and the remarks of the senior Senator from Missouri would apply to them equally as they would to those of us who wanted to make it possible for a vessel of the United States to have rights at least equal to the rights of a vessel of a citizen of the United States. But, sir, it seems to me that the junior Senator from Missouri, in the invitations he extended for the voluntary statement of the votes of Senators, demonstrated that it is not the purpose to put this bill in shape where it could be passed, but that it might be the purpose of those who would vote to adopt this amendment to embarrass the bill so that it could not get enough votes to pass.

I am sorry, sir, if that be so. For one, it was a matter of chagrin to me that the conference report on the emergency act of August last was defeated in the Senate, because the laws relating to the coastwise shipping were liberalized.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a remark?

Mr. BRYAN. In just a minute I will. I think the junior Senator from Missouri has tested the matter out sufficiently to show that the purpose is not to accomplish anything; and therefore I rose to say that on the vote upon the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, unless somebody will get up and say they will give us enough votes to pass the bill in that shape, it is my purpose to vote against his amendment.

Mr. REED. I simply started to say, in the absence of my colleague [Mr. STONE], that I thought the Senator had put an entirely wrong construction on his remarks, but I see that my colleague is here now.

Mr. BRYAN. I put no construction upon the remarks of the senior Senator from Missouri. There is no room for construction.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I voted against laying upon the table the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. I should be exceedingly gratified to see the House bill passed with that amendment; but, as has just been stated by the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN], it can hardly be hoped that the purpose or effect of that amendment would give any strength or bring an additional vote to the House bill. I am exceedingly anxious to see the House bill passed, and I shall not cooperate with those who are opposed to it, nor will I follow their suggestions with reference to amendments, even if I would like to see the amendments become part of the bill. I fear to load the bill down with amendments which may contribute to its defeat.

We all remember the lines from Virgil. They are applicable here:

Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I voted against the motion to lay the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama on the table for the reason that I believed in the principle which I supposed is presented. The people of the Pacific coast are suffering from high freight rates at this time. There was a shipper from the Pacific coast here two days ago who informed me that he paid higher freight rates than he would pay if he shipped around the Horn; if he ships through the Panama Canal, much higher than when he used the Panama Railway; and that of late all shipments have been refused. Through some understanding between the railroad companies and the steamship companies, he is compelled to ship by rail at a greatly increased cost.

I will vote for any amendment to this bill which will put that shipping in the hands of the Government, and I am going to say that I believe it would be more important to the people of this country and a greater benefit if the bill were confined to that single purpose, for we would be within our own waters; we would have no international complications, and we would not be purchasing ships to go through mine fields at the risk of being blown up by mines or submarines, nor would we run the risk of coming into conflict with either Germany or England in their contention. This country would be better off if this body would pass a bill forbidding the shipment of all munitions of war and food supplies to Europe until the war is ended. There are ships flying the American flag under our registry which six months ago were flying foreign flags, for the reason that it paid them to do so, and they are now scuttling across the seas ostensibly loaded with just freight and foodstuffs, while they are actually smuggling, concealed in their cargoes, or openly carrying contraband articles of war; and we are treading gingerly now in an effort to keep ourselves out of international complications.

I am in favor of the bill with or without this amendment, but more so with it, for the reason that I should like to see the Government undertake to control that very profitable industry through which the people of this country now are being mulcted in unholy and extortionate charges.

That is why I voted as I did on the motion to lay upon the table.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. OVERMAN. I voted this evening as I voted in the Democratic caucus. I was overruled in the caucus on that bill. I always stand by the Democratic caucus. I have never failed to do so. When this discussion came up there was a discussion in the cloakroom between some of my Democratic colleagues as to whether that would apply to this particular bill. They all said they did not think so; but it seems to be considered by some of my colleagues here that under the caucuses held as to the other bill we are bound as to this House bill that came over to us. Therefore, although I am in favor of the amendment, when I see that it is going to embarrass the bill, in order to stand with my Democratic colleagues, as I always have done, I propose to vote against the amendment.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. I voted to table the motion of the Senator from Alabama, not because I am not in favor of that principle, for I voted for that principle in the conference, and I regret that it did not carry; but I became satisfied that this amendment was one of the many amendments that have been offered in this body for the sole purpose of delaying and hampering legislation. I do not believe that there is any sincerity in the agreement at this time to refer the bill to a conference committee, as far as getting any action on it before Congress adjourns is concerned.

It is apparent to anyone who has watched the course of this body during the session that it has been the intention of the minority here to prevent legislation on any important matter. They have made of this body, for which they profess so much respect, a farce. For years this body has not been held in the highest opinion by the people of this country; no, not nearly so highly as some of the distinguished Senators themselves hold it. I do not believe the action of this body during the past session will change that opinion, unless it changes it for the worse.

This is not a legislative body. There is no right of determination of action in this body. It is simply a body in which we talk. It must be apparent that there can not be a legislative body wherein the right to vote is absolutely denied.

The distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], in his technical way, with which he is so familiar, has attempted to show that there is a rule that absolutely prohibits this body from forcing a vote. He has done it with all of the skill that he is capable of using, but it does not make any difference whether that be the strict rule of this body or not. If the rule violates the constitutional right of the Members of this body to reach a vote, it must be void. If the inherent right of the representatives of the people of this country to vote on pending measures is denied to them, then this ceases to be a legislative body.

I know that the distinguished Senators on the other side claim that the only function of this body is to talk. That is realized by this whole country. I want to say to them that they could not pass a statute, a rule, or establish a precedent forbidding the right to vote, and yet they attempt to accomplish indirectly that which they could not accomplish by direct action.

When this Congress adjourns on March 4 every bill pending in this body that is not acted upon will die, and the right of every Senator here to vote on those bills that die will be denied, no matter whether it be denied by direct rule or by the subterfuges used by the Senators who are filibustering in this body.

There is a time coming when that question will be settled. I call the attention of the Senators to other matters that were considered beyond the will of the people of this country. I believe, just as firmly as I believe that I stand here, that the Republicans on that side and the Democrats on this side who are denying the legislation that the people of this country want will have to answer to those people at the coming elections. They will not stand the excuses and the subterfuges that are offered to this body. They will look to the facts of the matter, and these Senators will have to answer with regard to those facts.

Why, they say, "If you are not satisfied with these rules, do not violate them—amend the rules," and yet, in the same breath, they claim that they can deny the right to vote on an amendment to the rules by talking until that motion is dead. The absurdity of the thing must appear to anyone. They contend that it is impossible to change the rules, and yet under the rules it is impossible to transact business in this body. They also say that no good measures have ever been killed by a filibuster. Who is to determine that question—the minority? The minority takes the power of determining that question. Let the majority pass the bill, and if it is a bad bill the people of this country will so determine and refuse to return to power the people who voted for such bills. But there are other things besides this shipping bill before the Senate. There are other matters besides these appropriation bills before the Senate. There are to-day on the calendar over 200 bills presented by Senators from all over this country, and they have been lying on that calendar unacted upon for three long months by reason of the filibuster that has been conducted in the Senate, by reason of the ancient privilege of denying a Senator the right to vote by talking to such an extent that a vote can not be had. We have waiting for us here the rural-credits bill, which can not be acted upon. We have before this Congress the seaman's bill, which can not be acted upon. We have the great claims bill before this body, affecting hundreds of people throughout this country, and it can not be acted upon. We have the Philippine bill before this body, and it can not be acted upon. We have reclamation acts throughout this great country of ours, and they can not be acted upon. We have bills here to protect the safety of miners—the miners working in the coal mines and working out there in the hard-rock mines of our State—and they can not be acted upon. We have hundreds of bills pending here to-day that can not be acted upon; and everyone in this country knows, or should know, the reason why they can not be acted upon. They should know that the Senators here who are pretending to defend this ancient prerogative of unlimited debate are not only killing this shipping bill but they are killing all of the legislation demanded by every section of this country. I want to say to them that that can not last and that will not stand before the people of this country.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let me ask the Senator from Nevada why it is that the Senate did not act on some of these bills that he has enumerated at the first session of this Congress or at the special session, when we were recessing from Monday to Thursday and from Thursday to Monday for three months, doing nothing?

Mr. PITTMAN. I want to say that nearly all of the filibustering during that time was also done by that side. I want to state that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] stood on this floor for days and days discussing the river and harbor bill, when the bill that the Senator from Ohio himself presented to this body only differed from the committee bill in a few million dollars out of the many, many millions of dollars. Was that a point of principle with him? Was it one of those great human rights that this prerogative is supposed to protect—a mere matter of whether it should be $35,000,000 or $55,000,000?

That was one of the great filibusters of the last session, and that thing has continued on throughout the whole of this session. You have tried to disguise it in one way and in another way. You have talked about the caucus at one time and you have offered amendments and subterfuges at another time; but the fact remains, and you can not deny it, that you have conspired for the purpose of preventing the passage not only of the shipping bill, but of the seaman's bill, the reclamation bills, the great conservation bill in the West, the claims bill, and all of these valuable measures that affect the people of this country.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes; and you have had in mind at the same time the bill to protect the people of this country against the materials made by convict labor. Oh, no; it is not so much the shipping bill that is getting under your ribs as it is the other bills here that are hanging behind the shipping bill. That question will be known to the people of this country, and the people of this country will call to account at the next election every man that runs that has taken a part in it.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. FALL. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. FALL. The Senator has referred several times now to the filibuster by the minority, and I have heard that from several other Senators——

Mr. PITTMAN. I beg your pardon; I mean the majority on that side.

Mr. FALL. Well, the majority on that side—is it the idea of the Senator that the proponents of this bill have ever, at any time, had a majority in this Senate for the thing that has been brought before this body, or that they have now a majority?

Mr. PITTMAN. I want to say to the Senator that if the Senators on that side had not known that we did have a majority, the filibuster would have stopped long ago.

Mr. FALL. Have you a majority now, do you think?

Mr. PITTMAN. I am satisfied to take a vote, whether we have a majority or not. That is all we have ever asked of you—to take a vote on this bill, whether we have a majority or not.

Mr. LIPPITT. Mr. President, was the Senator satisfied to have a vote in the long week when that side was filibustering against the bill, when the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] stood up in his place and admitted that he was filibustering?

Mr. PITTMAN. I want to say to the Senator that there has never been one moment since I have been here that I have not been willing to go to a vote on this bill. I do care whether the vote goes for or against us, but it would be better that this bill should be killed instantly by a vote outright than that all the important business of this country should cease. That is the question.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada further yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. PITTMAN. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. I will premise my question with the statement that I have given notice that I should make a speech to-day. I have decided not to make a speech because of the pending question, which relates to this bill. Will the Senator agree to take a vote upon the pending question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the pending question?

Mr. PITTMAN. To satisfy the Senator in this matter and waive all technicalities, I ask unanimous consent at the present time that we proceed to vote upon the Senate bill that is before this body, with the House amendments and all amendments thereto.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is not before the body.

Mr. FALL. In my own time I will express my views upon that subject.

Mr. PITTMAN. Then I ask unanimous consent that we proceed to vote without further debate upon the Senate bill, with House amendments and all amendments to it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is that a request by the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. PITTMAN. I make that request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As unanimous consent is requested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, let the unanimous-consent request be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the Senator from Nevada has asked unanimous consent to proceed at once to vote upon the bill as it came from the House and all amendments thereto. Is that the request?

Mr. PITTMAN. That is the request.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is, on the bill as it came from the House yesterday?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; the bill now before the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I object.

Mr. SMOOT. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the statement has been made by a number of Senators, who avow themselves as being in favor of the principle of this amendment, that it is offered for the purpose of embarrassing the bill. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] paused in his remarks to ask if there was any Senator on either side of the Chamber who had heretofore opposed the bill who will vote for it with this amendment. I now desire to inquire whether there is any Senator on either side of the Chamber who has been supporting the bill who will vote against it if this amendment is adopted. I pause for a reply. No Senator answers. It therefore appears, Mr. President, that so far as this amendment is concerned it may not affect the vote on this bill.

I shall therefore vote for this amendment. While I am heartily in favor of the shipping bill, I believe that this amendment will materially improve it. I can not vote to buy or build ships at the expense of the people and deny such ships the right to engage in our own commerce.

Mr. President, the proceedings in this body during the last six weeks have caused the people of this country to doubt the capacity of the United States Senate to transact business. It is not my purpose at this time to enter into a prolonged discussion on the subject of filibustering. If the character renowned in fiction, known as Rip Van Winkle, were to appear to-day he would find his counterpart in the membership of the United States Senate. We have under our rules failed to keep pace with the progress of the times, and Rip Van Winkle would be a wide-awake, live, and up-to-date citizen compared with the membership of the United States Senate, judged by the proceedings as demonstrated during the last six weeks of the present session.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield for a question.

Mr. THOMAS. Does not the Senator think that if Rip Van Winkle could be restored to life he would make a very worthy Member of this body?

Mr. ROBINSON. Rip Van Winkle slept for many years. The Senate has been asleep for a long time, and it has not yet awoke to the fact that it has lost, or is failing to retain, the confidence of the people of the United States by not keeping abreast of the times with its procedure.

As I said a moment ago, I shall vote for the Bankhead amendment without regard to the purpose which inspired its introduction here, because it has been demonstrated that this bill will lose no votes by it. Every Senator who has spoken on this amendment has declared himself in favor of it, and no Senator has risen on this floor and said that he is opposed to it. Then why not adopt the amendment and let it go to the conference?

While the proceedings on this floor have not disclosed the fact, it is well known to all of us here that an agreement has been reached by which this bill is to speedily go to conference. Let the amendment go to conference along with the amendments of the House to the Senate bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I offered this amendment in perfect good faith. I offered it believing that if it were adopted it would improve the bill. Before I offered the amendment I agreed with the distinguished Senator from Virginia and the Senator from Florida that I would not open my mouth in defense or in advocacy of the amendment. I was perfectly willing that it should be submitted to the Senate and let the Senate vote upon it. Immediately, sir, the Senator from Florida moved to table the amendment. The Senate refused to table the amendment. Now, then, the question is on the adoption of the amendment that I offered. That is the question the Senate must vote upon, and why not vote now? Why all this discussion and delay? If a majority of the Senate choose to vote the amendment down, all right, I will not complain. If the amendment goes to conference and comes back, it will not make a particle of difference to me as to how I shall vote. I have said to my colleagues here from the beginning of this controversy that I was willing and anxious to vote for this shipping bill if they would make it a temporary proposition; that if they would confine its life to two years after the conclusion of peace in Europe I would vote for it; and that was all the demand, and it was all the insistence that I have made.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question? Will the Senator vote for the bill with this amendment on it?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; if this bill comes back from conference and it contains nothing except that which authorizes this board to buy or build ships and operate them for two years, as under the provisions of the bill, and then go out of the business, I will vote for it. Will you?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes; I will vote for anything that the Democratic Party decides is good for the country. [Laughter on the floor and in the galleries.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate can not expect the Chair to rebuke the occupants of the galleries while Senators indulge in the same practice.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I was asking the Senator from Alabama in good faith if he would vote for the bill with his amendment upon it. Yes or no?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have answered that question directly. I have said that with this amendment or without it, if the bill came back from the conference with a provision that it is to be a temporary measure, that the Government should go out of the shipping business at the end of two years after the conclusion of peace, and the ships then be disposed of and the Government go out of their operation, I would vote for it, and I say so now.

That is all I have to say now and I am willing to vote. I do not propose to answer any more questions. You can vote or you can keep up this controversy to-day, and to-morrow, and the next day on the proposition whether you will vote yea or nay on the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I am not asking the Senator to yield. I thought he had concluded.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have concluded.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator from Alabama has just said that if this bill were presented to him with the provision upon it that upon the restoration of normal conditions, or two years after the expiration of war in Europe, the operation of the bill should expire, he would vote for it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I did not say that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The proposition here is to bring the bill back with the Weeks provision on it, which puts the Government permanently into the business. Of course I would not vote for it under those circumstances.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I still think I understood the Senator from Alabama correctly and that the record will bear me out. I understood the Senator to say that with or without the amendment which he has just offered, if the bill came back with the provision upon it that two years after the expiration of the war in Europe, or the restoration of peace, for they are synonymous terms, he would vote for it.

As I understand, the House amendments to the Senate bill, rather the Weeks bill, provide that within two years after the expiration of the European war these ships shall be handed over to the Navy of the United States and that the Navy shall use such of them as are suitable for naval purposes and sell, charter, or lease the balance of them. That seems to me to comply tolerably well with the requirement laid down by the Senator from Alabama. But in order to test now the sincerity of the Senator from Utah and the sincerity of other Senators upon this floor, who have been talking very recently, and only very recently asking for a vote, I now ask the unanimous consent of the Senate of the United States to immediately proceed to vote upon the Senate bill and the House amendments, and all other amendments, including this one pending thereto.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the same request I objected to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That was objected to about a minute ago.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understood the Senator from Nevada to ask unanimous consent that the House bill be voted upon. This is a Senate bill, with House amendments. I therefore renew the request in proper form in order that the record may carry out the facts of the refusal upon the other side of the Chamber to consent to a vote.

Mr. GALLINGER and others. Question!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. What is the pending question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. What was done with the request for unanimous consent made by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There was objection made to it.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, I ask the Senate to indulge me at this point for a few minutes. A great many things have been uttered during the course of this discussion that under ordinary circumstances elsewhere would provoke reply, but I established for myself when I came upon this floor certain ideals that I intend to maintain, and I have accordingly appeared to overlook many things that probably were intended for my notice. There are better places and other times when such things can be dealt with, if anyone feels disposed to there enlarge upon some of the suggestions that have been made. So much for that.

If it was the purpose of my associates on this side of the Chamber to find out how the seven Senators who felt unable to support the bill in its present form or in any of the various forms in which it has, from time to time, appeared here stood with reference to any provision contained in it, there was an easy way readily open to them. Some of them have seen proper to postpone to this hour the making of inquiry about this provision concerning the entrance of the Government-owned ships to the coastwise trade. For myself I never assumed that I had more wisdom than all of them, nor that my sense of patriotism was better developed than theirs. I differed from them profoundly about certain matters of policy and principle concerning the operation of Government-owned ships. I determined that, in the present state of the situation to be dealt with, my views were not such that they could be taken from me by caucus action by others as the result of any implied obligation I assumed when I became a Member of the Senate through the agency of the Democratic Party.

I may be permitted to say, in passing, that I am probably one of the few men on this floor who never sought nor received a Republican vote in his life for anything, anywhere, or any time, and I have enjoyed as many honors at the hands of the Democratic Party as any citizen of his State, and many times more than I deserved. I hold certain views of public policy and principle which are just as essentially a part of my nature as any part of my physical body, and I have cultivated the habit of insisting upon these respectfully and within the limits of my rights, candidly and completely recognizing the equal rights of every other person.

I do not take offense at the excessive earnestness and emphasis of Senators who deal in a more spectacular manner with political and public questions than I do. My range of observation in the world has been a wide one. I have been called upon to touch humanity at many points and to judge it from many angles. As the result of all this, I am forced to say that I find there is much of real honesty and sincerity among all classes, and much sound philosophy at the bottom of nearly all the political contentions that are made by organized groups in this good country of ours. I have therefore grown exceedingly tolerant of differences of political opinion, not only with my own party associates but with those with whom I do not affiliate in the matter of party alignment. But I did not intend to drift off on that subject. I want to address myself just for a few minutes to this particular amendment to the shipping bill.

It seems to me most monstrous at this time, of all times, when the current expenses of the Government are being paid out of an emergency tax—a war tax—levied upon the people, that $50,000,000 of their money should be taken to buy ships to meet an alleged emergency, when those very ships, by the terms of this bill, are not to be permitted to take up a pound of freight at one port in the United States and deliver it at another.

The chief contention made in proof of this alleged emergency is as to the movement of cotton. About 2,520,000 bales of cotton grown in the South go for spinning to New England ports; but this bill, intended to meet an emergency, to transport promptly and more directly than can be otherwise done by private shipowners, cotton can not be carried on these ships from the Gulf ports to the consuming ports in New England; that is to say, a shipload of cotton may not be taken from New Orleans, Galveston, Savannah, or Charleston and delivered at Fall River or any port along the New England coast under this proposed law. It seems to me that there must be some excuse, that there must be some explanation for that. The only one that I have heard preferred was by a Senator here, who said that by including a provision admitting ships purchased by the Government to the coastwise trade in the proposed law, they would encounter opposition that they did not care to reckon with, nor hope to cope with successfully. I presume he referred to the coastwise shipping monopoly, one of the most insolent and completely law-protected monopolies on this continent, and one that has oppressed the people of this country more than any other twice its magnitude, as everybody who knows anything about current affairs knows to be true. Why that particular trust should have been spared, why a contest with that particular trust should have been declined and foreclosed behind the closed doors of a Democratic caucus, is a burden of candor that rests on somebody and that must be discharged at some time. It seems that we have at least found one trust that the Democratic Party is afraid to grapple with at close quarters.

Now, a word about my refusing to vote for this bill. In August last, when the appalling consequences of this European war had not so clearly defined themselves as at the present time, I thought that it was simply a question of transportation to get the cotton that was produced in the South, and the wheat and the corn and the meat of the West, to the consuming markets of Europe, and I fell in promptly with the idea that if, for any reason, the shipping offered by private owners was not adequate to meet that demand, it would be nothing more than the Government's duty to supply it temporarily.

The matter has now been delayed until that emergency has come and gone, as I see it. Of course, I have only a surface knowledge about the facts and details of the shipping business, but this has been obtained from reliable public and private sources. But it seems to me that when wheat brings a dollar and sixty cents a bushel it is about time to keep it at home, for every time an additional million bushels is exported 10 cents a bushel goes on the price of the more than 600,000,000 bushels consumed at home.

So far as cotton is concerned, the exports during the months of December and January were in excess of those of any year since the cotton industry was first inaugurated. There has been more cotton shipped during those two months than in any two months in the history of the world. There was adequate shipping found for that even under all the difficulties of the existing situation. There may be an explanation for that, but the foundation and undisputed fact is that the shipping was found without Government participation.

It is said that the prices of shipping are excessive. That is a technical matter that has been explained by others, and I shall not detain the Senate at this time to go into it; but I want to say that it is like the answer that Mark Twain gave to the reporters who inquired as to whether or not the rumor that he was dead was true, when he said that the report was very much exaggerated. The rate from Galveston to Liverpool on cotton shipments in normal times is 85 cents a hundred; now it is a dollar and a quarter. The rate to German ports is a little more than that in normal times, while now it is $3 a hundred, or about $15 a bale. But they can not get it there at that. The rate is merely a theoretical one; it is never actually paid, because no direct shipments are ever made. If it was $150 a bale it could not be gotten there. In the case of transporting cotton to Germany it is not a question of ships, but it is a question of a free and safe sea to run them on. That is the real difficulty about shipments to Germany; it is not the want of ships, but it is the want of access. At this time the section from which I come can not receive the slightest possible benefit from the passage of this bill. I feel that I am justified in saying that the emergency has passed, not because we do not have on hand vast quantities of cotton and lumber seeking a market; and I know that the obstruction now to be reckoned with is not of a character to be removed by the purchase and operation of ships by the Government, but is one of the conditions imposed on mankind by this gigantic and ferocious war which has shocked the world from one end to the other.

As I have said, if our associates on this side had desired to ascertain our views about a form of bill that we would support, and that was the real purpose of those who differed from us, I venture to say that we would not have denied them a conference, with an inclination to surrender to a reasonable extent any differences of opinion as to mere matters of method.

If this bill had provided that the shipping board should consist of those technically informed about the shipping business in its commercial and operating branches, leaving out of it all official members—because, in my opinion, they have now duties and responsibilities enough of their own—if it had provided distinctly that no ship belonging to a belligerent should be bought, not in a shambling, double-meaning sort of way, that might ultimately, as a matter of construction, get us into trouble, but distinctly expressed in terms that everybody could understand in the same way; if then this matter of permitting these purchased ships to engage in the coastwise trade had been included, and another provision limiting it to the duration emergency which brought the plan into existence, although it is not now a matter of any great consequence to my section of the country, still I would have waived that, and voted for the bill, as it is my duty, and as it is always my pleasure, to do what I can to advance the general prosperity and interest of the whole country. I could have on that basis yielded my opinion in opposition. But I did not project myself into the discussion at all. I sat here for about four weeks, leaving my associates to conduct the matter to their own satisfaction, but so far as the roll calls disclosed, so far as the surface of things indicated, I was just as heartily in favor of this bill as anyone on this side of the Chamber. I have never participated to the extent of a single minute in any filibuster against it, and I do not intend to do so.

I do not know but that it is too late now to expect everybody to surrender his opinion and bring it into conformity with mine, but if it shall assume an aspect of that kind, I can only repeat—because I have not any desire to announce any new position—what I have stated several times, that I am willing to confer about that.

I do not believe that the occasion, according to my present information, justifies the passage of this bill. The maps of the world may be remade; new systems will be introduced, and new rulers inaugurated to execute them; a new and larger conception of human rights will follow this war. Then it will be time enough to learn to what extent the reorganized Governments will permit Government-owned ships to enter their ports to direct and control their commerce.

Commerce, in so far as navigation is a branch of it, involves the cooperation of other and distant countries. Their rights and selfish interests safeguarded and respected and their laws must be complied with. It is an inopportune time, in my judgment, to deal with this question; but I am not justified in entering upon any discussion of that question this afternoon, because I have said more than I intended to say in the entire discussion, and besides I am not prepared, as I should be, to do so to my own satisfaction.

I think that this amendment ought to be adopted now by those who believe in it. I do not believe that any improper influence was exerted upon a single Democrat in the caucus. I take no stock in this ward-heeler system of accusing gentlemen who are Members of the Senate by saying that they have allied themselves with this, that, or the other trust. I believe it was some question of policy, some question of the misconception of the strength of that institution and the friends that it could muster; some unfounded fear of its capacity to arouse into activity influences with which they feared to combat. Obviously it ought to be dealt with, and the people of this country are entitled to have it dealt with in the right way by the Democratic Party. Forming as it does one of our great industries, it is not to be ridden down roughshod, but it has enjoyed its exclusive and unfair privileges about long enough, and one of the new privileges that it ought not to enjoy is the privilege of keeping out of the ports of this country by law the ships that belong to the United States, and which the money of the taxpayers have supplied.

I am not particularly frightened about the proposition of the Government owning ships; but, according to my idea of things, ships are the very last utilities that the United States Government ought to take under control. It is the very essence of public control that it shall primarily contribute to internal development. There are ample opportunities for us now in connection with the telegraph, the telephone, and the remainder of the express business that will test out all of the strength that we can muster to bring those utilities under an orderly and efficient control. The shipping proposition involves the rights, interests, and cooperation of other countries. The profits of it are shared between those who load the ship at one end and those who purchase the load at the other. It is in the catalogue of utilities, I venture the opinion this afternoon, the very last that should call for Government control. I know that under existing conditions Government ownership and operation of ships will result in political management in the sense of a management directed by political influences, and these, when exerted in connection with matters of business, are always wasteful and frequently corrupt.

Our tariff laws have been so adjusted that it has been practically impossible for a ship leaving our ports to go out with a load and come back with another; but that, also, is a topic that would require to be enlarged upon, and I am not prepared to do it to my satisfaction this afternoon.

I sincerely trust that the Senate will put this particular amendment on this bill, and if the conference committee will safeguard properly the matter of neutrality and put in a provision preventing the ships belonging to the United States from transporting to the belligerents in Europe to-day arms and munitions of war to slaughter by thousands the best people on this earth, and fix the membership of the board as I have indicated, and definitely limit its duration as a temporary relief for a real or supposed emergency, I am here to tell you that I will make arrangements to vote for it without any violation of my conscience, and under the definite belief that I have done something for my day and generation.

Mr. GALLINGER. Question!

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] and vote "nay."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I have a pair to-day with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW]. I do not know how that Senator would vote if present, and in his absence I withhold my vote, but were I at liberty to vote I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. OLIVER. On account of my pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] I withhold my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 54, as follows:

YEAS—33.

So Mr. BANKHEAD's amendment was rejected.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Nebraska proposes to amend House amendment No. 3 by adding, at the end of section 16, the following:

That it shall be unlawful and treated as a breach of the neutrality laws of the United States for any person, partnership, or corporation to sell or contract to sell, or deliver or contract to deliver, during the existence of war between nations with which the United States is at peace, any arms, ammunition, artillery, and explosives of any kind whatsoever to be used against a country or nation with which the United States is at peace; and during the existence of war it shall be unlawful to sell for exportation or to export arms, ammunition, artillery, and explosives, except upon filing with the Secretary of Commerce satisfactory sworn proof that said arms, ammunition, artillery, and explosives are not intended to be used in violation of this provision.

Any person violating this provision shall be fined not more than $100,000 and imprisoned not more than three years, and any arms, ammunition, artillery, and explosives the exportation of which is attempted in violation of this provision shall be forfeited, one-half to the use of the informer and one-half to the use of the United States.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on laying the amendment on the table.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. OLIVER (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] and withhold my vote. I will allow this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). Making the same transfer as heretofore announced, I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair with the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], I withhold my vote. Were I at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 51, nays 36, as follows:

YEAS—51.

Brandegee	James	Pittman	Stephenson

So Mr. HITCHCOCK's amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, notwithstanding the fact that the result of the vote has been announced, I wish to state that I voted under an entire misapprehension. I wanted to vote for the amendment, but I was called out of the Chamber at the time, and I was not aware that a motion had been made to lay the amendment on the table. I am emphatically in favor of the amendment, so I wish to change my vote on the motion to lay on the table from "yea" to "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS. A point of order, Mr. President. Under the rules of the Senate, nobody can change his vote after the result has been announced.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from New York moves to amend the amendment of the House as follows:

Strike out all of section 7 of the amended bill after the word "further," in line 19, page 9, down to and including the word "neutrality," in line 21, page 9, and substitute in lieu thereof the following:

Without waiving any rights claimed by the United States under international law or any rights or principles hitherto asserted by the United States, no vessels shall be purchased under this act which are the property, in whole or in part, of any of the nations now at war, nor shall any vessels be purchased under this act which are the property of any of the subjects or citizens of said belligerent nations unless such purchases be made with the acquiescence or consent of all belligerent nations.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. GALLINGER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on laying on the table the amendment offered by the Senator from New York. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair, I will say that if I were at liberty to vote I would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. SIMMONS (after having voted in the affirmative). Making the same announcement and transfer as heretofore, I will allow my vote to stand.

The result was announced—yeas 45, nays 43, as follows:

YEAS—45.

Ashurst	La Follette	Pittman	Smith, Md.
Bryan	Lane	Pomerene	Stone
Chilton	Lea, Tenn.	Ransdell	Swanson

So Mr. O'GORMAN's amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In lieu of amendment numbered 3 of the House, the Senator from Michigan proposes to insert the following:

That a commission be, and the same is hereby, created for the purpose of fully considering the entire subject of over-sea shipping and the rehabilitation of the American merchant marine, to be composed as follows: Five Senators, who shall be appointed by the Vice President; seven Representatives, who shall be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives; and five practical, experienced business men and shipowners, who shall be appointed by the President of the United States; said appointments to be bipartisan in character, and the five members last provided for, if not already in the employ of the Government, to receive compensation at a rate not to exceed the salary of a Member of Congress. The said commission is hereby authorized and empowered to conduct an inquiry into the best means of reestablishing the American merchant marine upon broad principles of international comity and practical utility, and shall consider, among other things—

(a) The question of a subsidized merchant marine, through direct appropriations of the Government;

(b) The question of discriminating tariff duties in favor of American bottoms under such regulations and with such treaty modification as may be necessary to that end; and

(c) That the purchase or construction by the Government of the United States of merchant ships which may be used in over-sea commerce and in emergencies shall constitute an auxiliary merchant fleet for the Navy.

That said commission is authorized and empowered to sit during the session or during the recess of Congress, at any place or places which in its judgment shall be necessary; that the expense of said commission shall be paid out of any unexpended balance in the Treasury of the United States upon warrants to be issued therefor by the chairman or vice chairman of said commission; that said commission is authorized to take testimony, to administer oaths, and employ such necessary assistance as may be desirable in the conduct of its investigation, which shall be concluded within six months from the date this act shall become effective.

That the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of defraying the necessary expenses incident hereto.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I move to lay the amendment on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion by the Senator from Florida to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of the transfer of my pair as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I make the same announcement of my pair that I previously made. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 52, nays 31, as follows:

YEAS—52.

Ashurst	Johnson	O'Gorman	Smith, Ariz.
Bankhead	Kenyon	Overman	Smith, Ga.

So the amendment of Mr. SMITH of Michigan was laid on the table.

Mr. FLETCHER. I now move that the Senate disagree to the amendments made by the House and ask for a conference, the Chair to appoint seven conferees as managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, as a motion which has preference over the one just made by the Senator from Florida, I offer the following amendment to the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Add as a new section the following:

SEC. —. That no ship shall be purchased under the authority of this act from a belligerent nation, nor the citizens thereof, and no ship shall be operated by the United States, nor the shipping board, nor the corporation provided for herein, nor any lessee thereof, under the authority conferred by this act, to or from any port of a belligerent nation, nor to or from any European port during the continuance of the present war in Europe.

Mr. FLETCHER and Mr. POINDEXTER addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have the floor I think.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the Senator has not the floor. The Senator from Florida has the floor, and he moves to lay the amendment on the table. The question is on agreeing to the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. POINDEXTER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of the transfer of my pair as before, I vote "yea."

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina (when his name was called). I make the same announcement of my pair that I previously made. If I were at liberty to vote I would vote "yea."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 48, nays 37, as follows:

So Mr. POINDEXTER's amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I desire to offer a further amendment, but I see the Senator from Florida is on his feet, I suppose for the purpose of making a motion to lay it on the table. So I will make some remarks upon it before offering it. I was under the impression that when a Senator obtained the floor for the purpose of offering an amendment he was entitled to keep the floor until he gave it up. However that may be, I have no intention to make an objection to the parliamentary method of proceeding.

In view of the tabling of the amendment which I offered a moment ago, it is perfectly evident that it is the intention of the supporters of this bill to do the things which that amendment which has been tabled would have prohibited, namely, to buy belligerent ships and to operate ships so bought in the ports of belligerent countries and in the ports of neutral countries in Europe which are immediately in the war zone and are involved in all the delicate international questions which have arisen within the last few days between the Government of the United States and the great European belligerents. In view of that attitude and that evident intention of the administration, Mr. President, I will not be able to vote for the motion of the Senator from Florida nor to cast any vote which is favorable to this bill.

The Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] not long ago delivered quite an exhaustive address in the Senate upon this question of the right of a neutral to purchase the ships of a belligerent. I have read it with a great deal of interest. The Senator from Montana is undoubtedly entitled to commendation and to the appreciation of the Senate for the information which his address contains and for the research which evidently he devoted to preparing it. It was a fine shot, and I agree with the Senator from Montana that it comes near the mark. The trouble about it, Mr. President, is that he was shooting at the wrong mark, and I want to demonstrate that.

It reminds me of an occasion not long ago when some observers were down on the Potomac River for the purpose of witnessing the results of shell fire. They were stationed in a small ship about a quarter of a mile away from the target. There was one of these expert gunners of the United States Navy on the old battleship Tallahassee, about 10 miles away, shooting at a target with a 12-inch gun. The shot weighed about 500 pounds; and almost every shot either struck the target or missed it by a very small margin, all except one, and that shot was just as good a shot, it was a demonstration of just as good marksmanship as any other; but the trouble was he shot at us instead of the target. He came about as near hitting us in that shot as he came near hitting the target in most of the others. It was a good shot, but the wrong target. I think that can be truthfully said about the very able address of the Senator from Montana. He was discussing something which is not involved in this bill. His speech was entirely irrelevant. The Senator from Montana collected a large number of authorities upon the proposition that a private person, a citizen of a neutral, if he is acting in good faith and the transaction is complete, can buy the ships of a belligerent.

Mr. President, that question is not involved in this bill. The entire proposition on the part of a large portion of this side of the aisle is based upon the distinction between the purchase by a private citizen and the purchase by the Government. Neither the Senator from Montana, nor anyone else who has discussed the proposition on that side, has offered us any light or any authority as to the right of a neutral Government, supposed to be friendly to both the belligerents itself, in its governmental capacity to buy a belligerent ship.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. POINDEXTER. In just a moment I will yield to the Senator from Montana. I desire to complete my proposition.

Mr. WALSH. I simply desire to ask a question.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I will yield for a question in a moment, but not just now.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to ask the Senator, in view of the fact that he has stated that the objection upon the other side was founded upon the fact that the purchase was to be made by the Government, instead of by a private individual, to inform this side of the Senate by whom on that side the idea was ever advanced that there was any difference in result when the purchase was made by the Government instead of by a private individual.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am advancing it now; and I have heard it suggested by a number of Senators on this side. I think the distinction is perfectly obvious——

Mr. WALSH. Will the Senator kindly——

Mr. POINDEXTER. I decline to yield further at this moment. I will yield later on; but I should like to complete the sentence.

It ought to be perfectly obvious to all the proponents of this bill that the objection to the bill is that it involves the Government in the proposed action. It involves governmental ownership, governmental implication in the war, governmental trading in belligerent ports. It is upon the incident of Government activity that almost every Senator who has spoken in opposition to this bill has based his opposition. I might name a number of Senators who have taken that ground. I happen to notice in his seat the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], who very pointedly made this distinction, and, as the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] suggests, the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT] also made it, and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] to-day at an earlier hour made the same point. But, Mr. President, the point is obvious to everyone, and it is the point in one form or another about which the long controversy over this bill has been raging.

I do not want to detain the Senate as it is hastening on, with its nice regard for time, to a final disposition of this bill, except to make clear the basis of the objection which I attempted to explain in the amendment which was tabled. A private citizen of a neutral country may do a great many things in transactions with belligerents which the neutral Government can not do. A short time ago we were advised that the President of the United States, in his apparent almost universal care and watchfulness over the acts not only of the Senate but of the private business of the country—and I say this with all respect and kindness toward the President, because I feel that way toward him—objected to some private citizen making a loan of money to one of the belligerents. That attracted some attention because it was a new doctrine in international law that a private citizen of a neutral country should not be allowed to make a loan of money to a belligerent. That he has a right to do so, and that it is not a violation of international law for him to do so, I venture to say is laid down by every authoritative writer upon that branch of jurisprudence, and it is also laid down by them all that, while the private citizen may do so, it would be a breach of neutrality for a neutral Government to make a loan of money to one of the belligerents.

A private citizen of a neutral may sell contraband goods to a belligerent, if he chooses to take the risk of capture by a belligerent war vessel; and international law recognizes no offense in his shipping arms and munitions of war to one of the belligerents. It is a privilege universally exercised by merchants of all countries when the circumstances call for it, but it is also laid down by every writer upon international law that, on account of the distinction between the action of a private citizen and the action of the Government, a neutral Government is not allowed to sell contraband goods, such as ammunition and guns, to a belligerent power; and it is perfectly obvious why there should be such a distinction.

In a great digest of international law based upon the declarations of the officers of the United States Government during the entire period of its existence, a most interesting and useful compilation by Mr. John Bassett Moore, formerly counselor of the State Department, there are cited a number of authoritative rulings upon this subject. After discussing the proposition, which seems to be recognized everywhere, that private citizens of a neutral may trade in contraband with a belligerent, he says:

> In 1872 a question was raised in the United States Senate as to certain sales of "ordnance stores" which had been made by the Government of the United States during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1870, to persons who were said to be agents of the French Government. A committee was appointed to investigate the subject.

Then he goes on and discusses that question. I will not encumber the RECORD by reading the entire discussion, but he cites Hall, and says:

> Hall, referring to the above transaction, says: "The vender of munitions of war in large quantities during the existence of hostilities knows perfectly well that the purchaser must intend them for the use of one of the belligerents, and a neutral Government is too strictly bound to hold aloof from the quarrel to be allowed to seek safety in the quibble that the precise destination of the articles bought has not been disclosed."
> Perels, after stating the facts, remarks that they do not require comment.
> Snow expressed the hope that Mr. Carpenter's report "does not express the settled law of the United States upon this subject. It confounds the rights and duties of a neutral State with those of the private citizens of a neutral State, which is a very different matter."

Now, Mr. President, I propose to offer as an amendment to this bill by way of a substitute—I am not now offering it; I will withhold it for the present, but will offer it later—the following:

> That the President is authorized and directed to expend a sum not exceeding $50,000,000 for the construction of ships in American shipyards, preference being given to navy yards, and to operate said ships on such lines of trade, coastwise or foreign, as he may select, under such terms and regulations as he may determine: Provided, That such ships shall be constructed, as far as practicable, so as to be adapted for service both as naval auxiliaries and as merchant ships.
> SEC. 2. That the President may sell the bonds of the United States authorized for the construction of the Panama Canal, not to exceed the amount of $50,000,000, for the purposes of this act.

I see no difficulty, Mr. President, in finding ample constitutional authority for the Government to own and operate ships if we should decide upon that policy. I will not discuss now the question of Government ownership. In my opinion, it is the last resort in the administration and regulation of public utilities; but the time may come when we may have to adopt the last resort. If regulation shall have failed, I shall not shrink from Government ownership. The Government has constitutional authority to own and operate ships to carry the mail; it has constitutional authority to own and operate ships as auxiliaries to its Navy; it has constitutional authority to own and operate ships in the regulation of foreign commerce. It is not engaging in a private business. It proposes to operate them as a common carrier.

But what is proposed here? Mr. President, when it is presented to those who desire for one reason or another, for the building up of our Navy, for supplying this greatest defect, the want of transports and auxiliary vessels, that there should come under the flag of the Government a great fleet of vessels adapted in time of peace to use as merchant vessels, we find that the proposition is so framed that there will not be an American vessel created; that whatever fleet may be acquired will be disposed of in a very short time. The proposition of the President—and we must assume that this matter will be directed by the President—is that we should go into this enterprise for a short time, and when it becomes profitable dispose of it. The President's proposition is not that we should operate a line of ships to meet this great emergency in Europe, of which so much has been said on the other side. Reading from the President's message, he says:

> Therefore I propose another way of providing the means of transportation which must precede, not tardily follow, the development of our trade with our neighbor States of America.

That is the proposition of the President, that temporarily, in order to develop trade in America—in South America—we should put on a line of ships with that portion of the Americas; and that when it becomes profitable, when trade has been developed so as to encourage private enterprise, the Government shall go out of the business entirely and abandon its ships.

What is the bill which has been passed by the House and which is now pending before the Senate? It provides in express terms, in consonance with the policy of the President:

> SEC. 16. That two years from and after the conclusion of the present European war, that fact to be determined by the President, the corporation and the shipping board shall turn over and transfer all vessels purchased or constructed under the provisions of this act to the Navy Department, and the Secretary of the Navy shall have the right, with the approval of the President, to lease or charter any of such vessels not needed for naval or military purposes to any firm, individual, or corporation for use as merchant vessels.

What is the result of that plan as applied to the existing conditions of the merchant marine of the world to-day? A few days ago one of the Senators from Missouri, in a moment of intense feeling, rather intimated that everyone who opposed this bill was influenced by the Shipping Trust. Later on, in his cooler moments, he said—which of course was the fact—that he did not intend any such thing as that. But what must be the effect of this bill and this plan if carried out according to the intentions of the President and according to the express terms of the bill as it is now framed? It must be that the Government, if it produces any ships that are not now engaged in trade, would spend the money which is appropriated by this bill—thirty million or forty million dollars, or whatever the amount may be—for the ships of the Shipping Trust. If there is a Shipping Trust that controls all of the lines of commerce upon the Atlantic Ocean, where are you going to buy ships unless you buy them from the Shipping Trust? I want to show in a few moments, in a very brief way, that there is no idle ship for sale; that there is no ship that is not now fulfilling to its utmost capacity the needs of trans-Atlantic commerce between this country and Europe, except the interned vessels of the Hamburg-American and the North German Lloyd Lines, which are the holders and the owners of the vessels which belong to this combination which the Senator to whom I referred a moment ago dominates as the Shipping Trust.

If you are going to put a new ship into the commerce with Europe, one which is not now engaged in it, you would be compelled under this bill to take the interned, rusting, or rotting vessels of the Shipping Trust, and pay them the thirty or forty million dollars to be raised by the sale of United States bonds.

Then, what is the proposition? That when the so-called emergency has passed, when we settle down to normal conditions, we shall sell the ships back again to the Shipping Trust; and if this transaction is characterized by the ordinary lack of financial acumen that characterizes Government business transactions, we will sell them for a great deal less than we paid for them. That is the proposal.

I notice in a description of these interned vessels that they are vessels which have been used in the business of bringing to American shores the great hordes of the illiterate and laboring classes of certain parts of Europe; that is the chief business of these great steamship lines. Under the fortunes of war their ships are interned; their ships are rusting; their profits from carrying the steerage passengers who have crowded their vessels heretofore are cut off. The same interests which opposed the literacy test in the immigration bill are the interests which own the interned vessels and which are now desirous of selling them to the United States if this bill should pass. It is quite a coincidence—purely a coincidence, of course—that the Senators who are loudest in talking about the Shipping Trust are now advocating a bill which can have no other effect than to benefit the Shipping Trust by relieving it of its interned ships. The same Senators who employed every parliamentary expedient that it was possible for them to employ in order to defeat the effort of putting into the law a literacy test, which the Shipping Trust thought, according to the documents which have been published and circulated in this city, would interfere with their lucrative business of bringing over hordes of immigrants from Europe to compete with the laborers of the United States and to lower the standard of living in this country. I say it is quite an interesting coincidence.

A good many different reasons are given for urging this so-called emergency measure. One of them is, as I said a moment ago, that the rates on grain are so high that the poor farmers of this country are suffering by reason of it. Why, Mr. President, for a good many years the farmers of the West have been raising and selling wheat for less than it cost them. During the last season, on account of the war in Europe and other circumstances, for the first time in many years they received a good price for their wheat; and those of them who have any wheat to sell are receiving a good price for it now, and there is every prospect that they will receive a good price for it next year.

There used to be a man in New York—I think his name was Jones—who advertised that he paid the freight. He had the nerve to publish a picture of his face in almost every newspaper in the country, blowing a horn, and accompanying the picture were the words: "Jones—he pays the freight." I have no doubt that was true, that he did pay the freight upon the commodities which he had for sale; but he did not mention the additional fact that he collected it back again from his customers.

Of course we are interested in reasonable freight rates to Europe. We know that in the necessities which are arising out of war, the need of food for their people, the need of arms and munitions of war for their armies, they are willing to pay the freight, and are paying it in the greater part. When I read the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, I notice the plaintive appeal which he makes for the passage of this bill in behalf of the farmers of this country who raise grain, cotton, and other commodities; and to show what the burden imposed upon the farmers by these high ocean freight rates means, he says that the greatest increases in rates and the heaviest taxes are imposed upon the products in which the American farmer is most concerned, namely, grain and cotton.

Why, Mr. President, in view of the wealth which has lately been brought to the grain growers of the West as a due reward for the labors of many years in which they received no profits, it seems strange that the Secretary of the Treasury, the chief advocate of this bill, should ask its passage as an emergency measure, as a new departure in the policies of this Government, declining to accept any amendment which would prohibit the purchase of the ships of belligerents in order to relieve the farmers and the grain growers of the country of the situation in which they are placed. I think I can speak for the grain growers, in part at least, in some sections, and I say for them that they are not in need at this particular time of assistance or sympathy on account of the prices which they are receiving for their grain, and I say further that if they did, if they were in need, they would receive no relief from this bill.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, would it disturb the Senator if I asked him a question?

Mr. POINDEXTER. No; I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. GRONNA. Is it not a fact that on the 6th day of February, 1915, wheat sold in the market at Chicago for $1.67 a bushel, and that on that very same day it sold in London for 60 shillings a quarter, or, in other words, $1.73 a bushel, making a difference of only 6 cents a bushel?

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator states that as a fact, I accept it as such.

Mr. GRONNA. I state that. That is a fact.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, as I said a moment ago, there are various reasons given for this condition of ocean freights. One of them stated is that there is a trust or combine, and another one, rather inconsistent with it, is that there is not enough ship tonnage to supply the demand. Of course if it is due to a combine, the price would be put up regardless of the amount of tonnage, and if there is a shortage of ships the rates would go up whether there is a monopoly or not. Another one, entirely inconsistent with either of the foregoing, is that it is due to the uncertainties and to the dangers of war—to high war insurance. Now let us see what is the showing which was made by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Commerce themselves as to these conditions, as to what is the cause for these high rates.

I hear it said that we need Government ships to carry cotton to Belgium and to Germany and to carry tobacco to Italy; that there are not enough ships to carry it, and therefore that the Government must furnish them. In the supplementary report of the Secretary of the Treasury of January 27 I find certain statements, which I wish to read. I assume that the information it contains, being furnished by them, is reliable. You always construe the testimony of a party which he himself furnishes as binding upon the party who furnishes it.

I find here a letter from Mr. Justus Ruperti, of New York, of G. Amsinck & Co., addressed to the agent of the United States Government, Mr. Charles Ferguson; and what is the information which it contains and which he transmits to the Senate of the United States, as to the need of ships for carrying the supplies of the United States to these various countries? It is so astonishing, in view of the great insistence upon this measure through all sorts of conditions and times and hours of the day and night, that I want to read a portion of it. He says:

> A line to Italy does not seem necessary, as the Italian Government has sufficient steamers, if only the United States Government will stand together with the Italian to protect these steamers from constant and in many cases unnecessary interference and delay.

Now, as to the need of a line to Denmark, Norway, and Holland, he says:

> There is at present also not sufficient freight open, but there should be enough steamers of those countries—which have fleets of their own—to insure a sufficient traffic, if the United States will assist those countries also in maintaining a service which is not unnecessarily hampered and interfered with by the warring nations, as is done at present, where a great many commercial transactions for supplying those neutral countries with their requirements, and which are in no way affected by any articles of contraband of war or supplies for the fighting nations, are hampered and stopped.

That is the showing which is made by the Secretary of the Treasury, and from it it appears that there is no need of ships in the trade with Holland, Scandinavia, and Italy, but that the high rates are due to interference with the operation of these ships by the war vessels of the belligerent nations.

Mr. President, where are we going to get ships? I will submit the amendment which I desire to offer after calling attention to this. This is also evidence which is furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of Commerce in the report to which I have just referred. On page 38 of that report there is printed an article—evidently which they approve—in which the fact is clearly and emphatically stated that every available vessel than can be operated in this trade is engaged in it at present, and that every shipyard which is capable of constructing ships is busy constructing ships.

In every direction it will be seen that huge profits are to be made in the shipping industry. Nor are shipowners the only ones to feel the boom. The prosperity has created a demand for more ships. The price of steamers is rising daily, and shipbuilders are booking so many orders that their yards will be full for some years to come. Many shipowners also are selling off their old tonnage at prices which they never dreamed of before the outbreak of war.

Investigation goes to show that the present boom has been of a much greater nature than during other wars. After the Franco-Prussian War, for instance, the boom did not set in until some 12 months after the declaration of peace. By this time the nations had time to turn around, and finance was readjusted. And then the rise in freights was more gradual. It was not until 1882 that the top of the rise appeared.

It is interesting to note that the only rate approximating to present figures was paid to the Ben Nevis, a steamer with a carrying capacity of 7,500 quarters, or about 1,500 tons, which obtained 8s. 3d. per quarter from New Orleans to Rouen.

* * * * * * *

The shipment of wheat commences from the end of December, however, and already many vessels have been chartered, the rates of freight for steamers which will be ready to load in January and early February rising within the last month or two from 20s. per ton to 37s. 6d.

* * * * * * *

The beginning of the season has not seen a large number of steamers chartered to Italy, but it is now stated that, in addition to the enormous quantities which are being imported from North America, the Italian Government has purchased some 400,000 tons of wheat and oats from the Argentine Republic for shipment from the River Plata.

I read that for the purpose of demonstrating, by the testimony of the proponents of this bill themselves, that every available ship is engaged in this trade, and that even if the Government can purchase them, they can not carry any more freight than they are carrying now; and as for the relief which could be experienced in freight rates by the operation of the small number of ships which the Government would acquire under this bill, even if it operates them in the European trade, it would be impossible for them to take care of more than a small portion of the enormous shipments which these reports indicate are now being made to Europe, and would have but a negligible effect upon rates.

The only remedy aside from building ships, Mr. President, is the purchase of these interned vessels. The result of that would be that vessels which have suffered the penalty of the superior navy of their adversaries and have been practically interned, which are forbidden from the sea, would be released; money would be spent in a foreign country for replacing them with other vessels, and the United States for its investment of thirty or forty million dollars would have a number of vessels rapidly growing obsolete, which it would be impossible for it to operate profitably in competition with more modern vessels equipped with new kinds of engines, Diesel engines, submerged flame combustion—internal combustion, as it is called—and all the improvements in the way of marine engines which are now being placed in vessels being constructed at the present time.

Mr. President, if we spend the amount of money provided in this bill it ought to be spent in this country. There never was a time in the history of the country when something that would afford occupation to the idle workmen of this country would be more opportune. Instead of undertaking to release the bound-up ships of a belligerent nation a bill should be passed, if we decide to embark upon this policy, which would restore the hum of industry to American shipyards and give some occupation to the navy yards of the United States, now being maintained at a great expense without any corresponding results.

However desirous we might be that the Government of the United States should build up an auxiliary fleet or should engage in the shipping business, I submit that it would be folly to undertake, as is proposed here, and insistently proposed, when we acquire the ships, to operate them in the midst of a flagrant war, when everybody knows that the destruction of one of them, even though covered by the thin subterfuge of a private corporation which is owned by the Government, would create a feeling in this country that would bring us perilously near the declaration of hostilities, either by our own or by some foreign Government.

I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add, in amendment No. 3, the following:

That the President is authorized and directed to expend a sum not exceeding $50,000,000 for the construction of ships in American shipyards, preference being given to navy yards, and to operate said ships on such lines of trade, coastwise or foreign, as he may select, under such terms and regulations as he may determine: Provided, That such ships shall be constructed, as far as practicable, so as to be adapted for service both as naval auxiliaries and as merchant ships.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is upon laying on the table the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the motion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] to disagree to the amendments of the House and ask for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to, and Mr. FLETCHER, Mr. RANSDELL, Mr. MARTIN of Virginia, Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. NELSON, Mr. BURTON, and Mr. CRAWFORD were appointed as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I simply desire to give notice that in the morning, immediately after the completion of the morning business, I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate adjourn until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 7 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, February 19, 1915, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 18, 1915.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, Infinite Spirit, our heavenly Father, for the enthusiasm which fills the breast of the man of convictions and impels to action because he feels down deep in his heart that he is in consonance with the eternal laws which Thou hast ordained. To him we owe a debt of gratitude which can not be expunged. Science, literature, art, government, religion are his contributions to the world. Give to us, we pray Thee, convictions, that we may be lifted out of self by enthusiasm into the higher realms of thought and action, exemplified in the life, character, and precepts of the Jesus of Nazareth. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

CORRECTION OF A PENSION BILL.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday morning the House agreed to a conference report on pension bill H. R. 20562. The Clerk overlooked amendment 36, and it was not included in the conference report. I ask unanimous consent that the House recede from its disagreement to amendment No. 36 and agree to the same.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the House recede from its disagreement to amendment 36 to the bill H. R. 20562 and agree to the same. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WEBB was recognized.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to make a motion to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider the pension appropriation bill, which it is necessary to pass. I ask the Chair to recognize me for that purpose.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that the Chair had recognized me before the parliamentary inquiry by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BARTLETT. But I was on my feet and looking at the Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Well, a good many people look at the Speaker.

Mr. BARTLETT. Trying to catch the Speaker's eye.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had already recognized the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Chair to lay before the House the bill H. R. 17869, now on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. If this is going to take any considerable length of time, the Chair will ask the gentleman to withhold it for the present.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand that it will take some time.

Mr. MANN. It will take considerable time.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, under Rule XXIV is it not in order and have we not the right to have the Chair lay before the House bills on the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. There is no doubt about that, but the Chair has a supervisory power over the proceedings of the House.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, to save time I will raise the question of consideration on the bill called up by the gentleman from North Carolina.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina can call his bill up to-morrow morning.

Mr. WEBB. Can I not call it up this afternoon immediately after the passage of the pension bill?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can call it up as soon as we get through with the pension bill.

Mr. WEBB. Then I withdraw my request.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 19545. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; and

H. R. 19376. An act confirming patents heretofore issued to certain Indians in the State of Washington.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled joint resolution of the following title:

S. J. Res. 187. Joint resolution requesting the President of the United States to invite foreign Governments to participate in the International Congress on Education.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the pension appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. CLINE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the pension appropriation bill, of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 21161) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and for other purposes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire as to the consumption of time in general debate, how much has been used on both sides?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia has had 1 hour and 15 minutes and the gentleman from Illinois has occupied 35 minutes.

Mr. HINEBAUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 12 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SWITZER].

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, the bill under consideration carries appropriations to meet our obligations growing out of the administration of the pension laws which have been enacted on account of services rendered in the Army and the Navy in the defense of our country, and I know of no appropriation made by Congress to which the people give a more cheerful assent.

I recall with pride that my first effort on the floor of this Chamber was in support of the passage of the Sherwood pension bill which as amended and finally enacted by Congress carried an increase of pensions to more than 400,000 Civil War veterans. I was among the first of those to advocate eliminating from the original Sherwood bill those provisions which excluded from its benefits veteran inmates of soldiers' homes and those veterans who were recipients of an annual income of a thousand dollars or more. The increases carried by this bill were in no instance unreasonable, and in the amount they no more than equaled the increase in cost of living since the passage of the dependent bill of 1890 and the subsequent old-age pension bill.

Since the Sherwood law has been passed more than 100,000 Civil War veterans have died. The grim reaper is fast depleting their ranks, and of the 35,000 who die annually thousands of them leave widows who under the existing laws are entitled to draw a $12 monthly stipend. Many other thousands have been found to be so necessitous and with claims so meritorious that they have been granted pensions by special acts of Congress. But there are other thousands who are just as necessitous, whose claims are as meritorious, who are heartlessly refused any relief by this great Government.

On the 7th day of last December I introduced into this House a bill to remove from existing law that limitation which excludes widows whose marriages to the old soldiers date subsequent to June 27, 1890. Since I introduced that bill I have learned that on the 23d of May last the Senate Committee on Pensions recommended for passage and reported out the Spanish-American War widows' bill, which was passed by this House more than a year ago, with an amendment eliminating the limitation to which I have just referred, and to bring the bar down to a date which will correspond to the time of the passage of the proposed amendatory legislation. Anyone who has made a casual investigation of our pension laws will readily concede the justice of the amendment proposed by the Senate Committee on Pensions. I have been informed that if it is allowed to be brought to a vote at this session of Congress it will pass the Senate by an overwhelming majority; but will it be allowed to come to a vote? The Department of the Interior has estimated that the passage of the proposed legislation to which I have just referred will necessitate an annual increase of appropriations for the next few years of $7,500,000, two million and a half of which will be needed on account of the deceased Spanish-American War veterans and $5,000,000 on account of the deceased Civil War veterans. Twenty-four years after the close of the Civil War, at a time when we numbered only about 63,000,000 people, when our estimated wealth was only about $62,000,000,000, Congress, recognizing the great hardships imposed upon widows to be compelled to prove that the death of the old soldier was caused by some disease or injury contracted or incurred in the service and desiring to treat them more liberally, inserted in the dependent act of 1890 a provision giving a pension of $8 a month regardless of the cause of death. The amount has since been increased to $12 per month.

In order to remove the incentive to marry an old soldier, sick and decrepit, whose time on earth in all probability would be short, for the purpose of securing a widow's pension, the Congress included among its beneficiaries only those widows who married the soldier prior to June 27, 1890. Twenty-four more years have now rolled around, and it seems to me to be unjust, and it certainly is unjust, that the widow who married the old soldier a few days or a few months or a few years prior to June 27, 1890, should now be entitled to a pension, while the widow who married the old soldier a few days subsequent to that time has no pensionable status under the law. One was as much the wife of the soldier as the other; one is as much the widow of the soldier as the other and just as much entitled to a pension as the other. It seems to me that 24 years is too long a time to allow such a gross inequality to remain in any pension law, especially a pension law for a great Nation like this, comprised of 100,000,000 people, whose wealth to-day is estimated at twice what it was at the time of the passage of the dependent act in 1890.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWITZER. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman will find, if he was here the other day, when we passed——

Mr. SWITZER. I can not yield for a speech.

Mr. BARTLETT. I will give the gentleman the additional time. If the gentleman was here the other day, he will remember that the Pension Committee reported out at least a half dozen bills where the widow had married the soldier some time after that time and a pension was granted. I call attention to that fact because one of the very few cases I have was one of those, and I had not been able to get it considered.

Mr. SWITZER. Mr. Chairman, I think I have just stated that Congress found many cases of old widows who were not entitled to a pension under the general law whose cases were so necessitous and meritorious that they have been given pensions by special act of Congress; but there are other thousands that are unprovided for, and it will be an utter impossibility to grant special acts for all of them.

There are thousands of widows who are to-day drawing pensions who lived with old soldiers as their wives a much shorter time than thousands of those who married the soldier since 1890. Can anybody give any valid reason why this outrageous discrimination should continue against the widow who lived as the wife of the old soldier for 5, 10, 15, or 20 years since 1890? I know that many will say that this is an inopportune time to press legislation which will necessitate an increase of appropriations to some extent for the next few years; but, with a deficit confronting us in our national revenues, this Congress has enacted a war tax to help build railroads in Alaska, and only yesterday this House voted to issue and sell millions of dollars of bonds to enable the Government to go into the shipping business—to go, you might say, buccaneering upon the high seas in quest of foreign trade—to make conquest of the marts of the world.

If we must contribute to a war-tax fund, I submit that the widows and the dependents of those who have defended the country in time of war ought to be allowed to share in the benefits of that fund, and I think that seven and a half millions of dollars is a reasonable demand for such purpose out of $100,000,000 of war-tax revenue. Of course, we have been told that this matter ought to go over until next winter, but we are informed through the newspapers that this administration proposes to follow "the watchful-waiting policy" in looking after and caring for the deficit which now confronts us, and with an $80,000,000 deficit on top of a war tax next December, and with $48,000,000 of sugar revenue disappearing May 1 following on account of the automatic workings of the iniquitous Underwood tariff law, the same argument that is advanced to-day for postponing this legislation will again be advanced, and it will be accentuated one-hundredfold on account of the conditions to which I have just alluded.

Mr. Chairman, are we to go to the country at the close of this Congress with the proposition that there is no hope during this administration for any legislative relief for the unfortunate widows to whom I have just alluded? It will not do to say that there is no sentiment in this country for this legislation. The Civil War veterans throughout the whole Nation demand it. The Spanish-American War veterans demand it, and the Senate in the closing hours of the last Congress passed a bill, practically the same bill that the Senate committee reported out on the 23d day of May last. The President prevailed upon this House a day or two ago to pass a shipping bill for the moral effect it might have on the legislative body at the other end of the Capitol. It seems to me that it would be wisdom for the Committee on Invalid Pensions to consider my bill and report it out, or some similar measure, and secure its passage through this House in order to wake up the slumbering bill which the Senate committee reported out last spring.

Mr. GOULDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWITZER. I will.

Mr. GOULDEN. I desire to ask the gentleman if he is familiar with what changes or amendments were made in the Senate with regard to the bill they have just reported out with reference to Spanish-American War widows?

Mr. SWITZER. I do not know that I can accurately answer the gentleman; but I think they reported out practically the same bill that was passed by the House. The only difference is that they have recommended an amendment to that bill which takes care of the trouble of which I have just been complaining by giving pensions to widows of Civil War veterans who married soldiers since June 27, 1890, and bringing the bar down to date of the passage of this proposed legislation.

Mr. GOULDEN. I think I agree with the gentleman in the main, but I question whether we would want to bring it down quite as far as that. Perhaps, in common justice, if we should bring it down 10 years it would be about right; say 1900, as many needy and deserving widows of veterans of the Civil War who married the soldier after 1890 are entitled to this recognition.

Mr. SWITZER. There is an honest difference of opinion upon that proposition, but I think at least it ought to be brought down to 1910. I feel confident that the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the House favors some relief of this kind.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. I will yield the gentleman five minutes, having occupied a portion of his time.

Mr. SWITZER. I will take just a moment more. Of course there is great pressure brought upon the members of the Invalid Pensions Committee by the leaders of the majority to practice rigid economy at this time. They hesitate to act, but we know and the people of this country know that appropriations are being made every day which the revenues of the next fiscal year will be unable to meet, and they know we propose some time in the future to either correct the blunders and mistakes made in the recent revision of the tariff laws or increase some of the existing rates of taxation or develop and enact some new tax machinery to take care of these appropriations and these deficits that we are making at this time. It seems to me it would be the part of patriotism, that it is our duty, to include that small increase of appropriation of seven and a half million dollars, although to some extent enlarging the deficits we know will be on hand at the convening of the next session of Congress. [Applause.]

I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back three minutes.

Mr. HINEBAUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND].

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, I was very glad of the opportunity on Monday of this week to cast my vote during the numerous roll calls in favor of the bill (H. R. 12292) to prevent interstate commerce in the products of child labor. Owing to the lateness of the hour when the bill was taken up, and due to the filibuster attempted by certain southern Democrats bitterly opposed to the legislation, practically all discussion upon this important bill was cut off in the House.

I avail myself of the present opportunity, therefore, to briefly discuss this important measure, which is now pending in the Senate, where I sincerely hope it may not be lost sight of because of present chaotic conditions in that body.

Briefly, the bill provides in section 1 that it shall be unlawful to ship in interstate commerce the products of a mine or quarry which have been produced by the labor of children under 16 years of age, or the products of any mill, cannery, factory, or like establishment produced by children under 14 years of age. Products are also prohibited shipment from establishments where children work more than eight hours a day or more than six days a week, or after 7 p. m. or before 7 a. m.

Section 2 designates the Attorney General, the Secretary of Labor, and the Secretary of Commerce as a board to enforce and carry out this law.

Section 3 empowers the Secretary of Labor or any person designated by him to enter and investigate any establishment that produces or manufactures goods for interstate commerce.

Section 4 makes it the duty of any district attorney upon proper reference of violation of the act to prosecute in the Federal courts the violator.

Section 5 provides the penalty for violation of the act. The maximum fine is $1,000, the minimum $100, with an additional provision of from one year to one month's imprisonment or both fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court.

This section also contains a provision absolving a dealer from prosecution if the dealer can establish a guaranty from the producer or manufacturer that the provisions of this act in regard to age and hours of employees was not violated. This guaranty shall be void unless containing the name and address of the person giving the same. In the event of violation of the guaranty the person giving it is subject to prosecution and penalties.

Section 6 provides that each shipment or delivery for shipment shall constitute a separate offense.

Section 7 provides that the act shall become operative one year from its passage.

Within continental United States in 1900, according to the census of that year, 1,750,178 children between the ages of 10 and 15 years were engaged in gainful occupations. Of this number 142,105 were only 10 years of age, 158,778 were 11, 221,313 were 12, 268,427 were 13, 406,701 were 14, and 552,854 had reached the age of 15 years. This was over 18.2 per cent of all the children in the United States between the ages of 10 and 15 years.

The census of 1910 shows a slight increase in the number of children employed at the ages mentioned—a total of 1,990,225. This is 18.4 per cent of the children of corresponding age, as against 18.2 per cent for 1900, 10 years previously. It is an encouraging sign, and no doubt an evidence of the activities of those engaged in the work of eradicating this evil, that the 1910 census figures show a marked decrease—18.8 per cent—in the number of children of both sexes between the ages of 10 and 15 years employed in nonagricultural pursuits—occupations most harmful to those of tender age.

It is to be regretted, however, that thousands of children are yet employed in coal mines, in poorly ventilated cotton, silk, and other textile mills. Many toil in the sweatshops of the great cities, in glass factories at night, and in cigar and cigarette factories. The injurious effect of this labor upon the health of children, particularly during the adolescent period, is recognized by those who have made a scientific study of the subject.

While it is recognized that many States have passed child-labor laws, many of them effective, the enactment of a national statute upon the subject is certain to bring about a greater uniformity. It is also recognized that in certain States where the evil is most pronounced no action has been taken.

Opposition is frequently encountered to State legislation from manufacturers who contend that if they are compelled to discontinue the employment of children while their competitors in neighboring States continue to enjoy the benefits of this cheaper labor, the result will prove financially disastrous. This but strengthens the argument for a national attack upon the evil.

In Mississippi over 63 per cent of boys between the ages of 10 and 15 years are employed in gainful occupations according to census bulletins, and over 43 per cent of the girls. In Alabama, North and South Carolina the percentage is about as high.

For many years Congress has been discussing this important subject. It strikes me that the time has come to act. We have passed legislation in this body within recent years to conserve our national forests, to protect the coal of Alaska, to preserve animal life, and to safeguard the scenic wonder spots of the Nation. Shall we longer permit commercial greed to prevent the conservation of our children—the boys and girls who must face and solve the great problems of to-morrow?

Mr. HINEBAUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] 10 minutes.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from California has just given an illustration of unfair competition in business—the use of child labor by some manufacturers when other manufacturers, more scrupulous, will not resort to such methods. Unfair competition is the greatest curse to American business to-day. It means the law of the jungle, under which the strong and cunning and unscrupulous always overpower the weak. Because of that fact, unfair competition carried to its logical end advances concentration of wealth, control by the few, and monopoly.

One of the most dangerous methods of unfair competition is the price cutting of standard, trade-marked goods, which have in them the reputation of the maker and his purpose to make them products which will secure and retain the confidence of the buying public.

I am in favor of the doctrine that a manufacturer who has distinctly identified his product and fixed its value in the public mind should have the right to protect the sale of his merchandise, the good will of his trade, and the good name of his product by fixing the retail selling price of that product. I contend that the maintenance of the retail price is a necessary and legitimate business principle, that it means benefit to all and works injury to none.

This right of price maintenance for specialties and branded articles was recognized as a legal one until a few years ago. Recently, however, successive decisions of the United States Supreme Court have taken that right from the manufacturer, and an entirely new situation confronts business as a result of these judicial decisions.

For many years the decisions of the Supreme Court held to the general principle that a manufacturer could sell or refuse to sell his goods, as he saw fit. Then the tenor changed, and now the court has practically reversed its decisions and takes the opposite view.

The first case that ended in a decision questioning the right of the manufacturer to fix the resale price was that of the Bobbs-Merrill Publishing Co. against the R. H. Macy Co. of New York.

The Bobbs-Merrill Co. published a copyrighted book which was marked to sell at $1. The Macy company cut the price, and the publishing company brought suit for an infringement of copyright, on the ground that it had the right to fix the selling price.

The Supreme Court held that as Macy & Co. had made no express contract to sell the book for $1, it was not bound to maintain the price. The case was decided upon the facts, and thus did not touch on the question of previous agreement or the rights of manufacturers of patented articles. It was important, however, in that it showed the trend of mind of the court, which was followed out in later decisions.

The next case was that of the Miles Medical Co., which sought to maintain the retail prices of its proprietary medicines. The court decided that when a manufacturer sold his goods he parted with all his property rights and could not control the resale price. It was further held that such fixation of price was in violation of the Sherman antitrust law.

Still this case did not touch the question of patented articles, but the rights of the patentee was the question at issue in the next case, that of Henry versus the A. D. Dick Co.

The court upheld the agreement in this case, but Justice White dissented in a minority opinion—and this minority opinion became the majority opinion in the next case decided. This was the case familiarly known as the Sanatogen case, and the decision in it held the opposite view from that in the Dick case. The change of a single vote in the Supreme Court made the doctrine of price maintenance and contracts for price maintenance illegal and in violation of the Sherman antitrust law.

The Waltham Watch Co. case followed, and the court repeated its decision that the patentee, while he might create selling agencies to control the price, could not fix the price after outright sale to the dealer.

This was the last case decided and finished the series of decisions in which the Supreme Court has completely changed its former attitude, and now holds that contracts for the maintenance of the price of copyrighted or patented articles are illegal, contrary to public policy, and void under the antitrust law.

The court makes three exceptions in its decisions, and declares that manufacturers can maintain prices, first, by establishing selling agencies dealing directly with the ultimate consumer; second, by reserving a substantial royalty from the retail price; third, by selling direct from the plant through personal application or mail orders.

That is the situation as it stands at present. Because of this judge-made law, made in some instances by one man only, manufacturers face entirely new and wholly unjust conditions in the transaction of business. Uncle Sam makes it a crime for anyone to sell a postage stamp at less than its face value. Price cutting on his brands is prohibited, but price-cutting dealers are permitted and encouraged to depreciate the value of the goods of independent manufacturers without let or hindrance.

To remedy the injustices involved in this situation, an act of Congress is necessary, and such a measure, known as the Stevens bill, is pending in this Congress. It provides that maintenance of price shall be legal, provided that the producer does not have a monopoly of a general class of merchandise and is not a party to a combination for the purpose of securing such a monopoly. It provides that the price must be printed on a notice affixed to each article and that the producer must file with the Bureau of Corporations a statement giving the brand, trade-mark, and so forth, and the uniform price to wholesalers, retailers, and consumers. Articles may be sold for less than the uniform price when a dealer retires from business or becomes bankrupt, or if the goods are damaged or soiled. In such cases, however, the dealer must offer the manufacturer or vendor the opportunity of purchasing the articles at the price paid for them.

I submit that this measure should be passed. I believe that the right to fix the retail prices of standard brands of merchandise of fixed quality is a benefit to the manufacturer, dealer, and consumer.

It will protect the manufacturer from unfair competition, and will prevent trade pirates from ruining his business.

The manufacturer produces a standard article and gives it a trade-mark or trade name. He spends his money to make that name mean quality to the public mind. He has a right to be protected after he has made that individual trade name valuable, for it is his property, and his alone. Under the law to-day he may collect damages from those who steal it from him and use it for themselves.

But the value of his trade-mark is not alone in the name or in its form or color or shape. It is more than a certain kind of box or label. It is a symbol to the public of a certain quality of goods and the character of the concern that makes them. Any practice, therefore, that injures the article in the public mind and damages the reputation of the firm is as unfair as the theft of a trade-mark itself. It should be equal ground for a suit for damages.

Mr. WEBB. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. WEBB. Does the bill to which you refer apply only to trade-mark goods?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. It refers to all standard identified goods which are not monopolized, and its purposes are clearly expressed in the bill itself.

Mr. WEBB. That is, all goods that have been well advertised?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. All goods that have been identified by the manufacturer until they have a certain value in the public mind.

Mr. WEBB. Who is to decide that question?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The decision must be made, under this bill, by the manufacturer when he gives his trade-mark to the Bureau of Corporations, together with his uniform price to the wholesaler, retailer, and consumer.

The manufacturer of such an article must put real value into his goods and he must make the public want his article. He individualizes it and gives it a name to be known by. He must establish a general market and advertise constantly the merits of his goods. He advertises the price, for he must convince the public that it is worth the price asked and persuade the people to go to a store and pay that price.

This is the manufacturer's most valuable asset, and upon it depends his business. But after he has made his article mean a certain value and quality and has created a demand from the public the price cutter begins his attack. In fact, it is because of this value and this demand for a particular article that leads the price cutter to select it. The public knows the value of the article and may be fooled through a low price on it into buying articles of which they do not know the value. The manufacturer is penalized for having made a uniform, individualized, known value, and known quality product.

The price cutter takes this widely known article and reduces its price below cost. He does this, not for the purpose of selling more of them, for the fewer he sells the better he is satisfied and the less he loses. He wishes to attract customers on the strength of this bargain price so that he may sell other goods at a greater profit than that on the standard goods. He seeks to create the impression that all his goods are sold at prices proportionately as low as that on the article whose value is well known to the public.

Now, it is obvious that other dealers must meet this cut price if they are to continue on an equal plane with this competitor. They cut the price to an equal or lower figure, but at the same time they lose all desire to sell the article on which they are forced to lose money. That strikes a fatal blow at the manufacturer, for his market is destroyed and he is helpless to prevent it. Cheaper substitutes are sold instead of his article and dealers in time refuse to carry his goods at all. His advertising and his efforts in every way to make his trade-mark mean a certain price and a certain value are rendered useless through the practices of price-cutting trade pirates.

I consider that such unfair competition is as bad as outright theft of trade-marks and brands and should be as severely frowned upon by the law. It is a case of stealing a man's good name, which, as Shakespeare said, is worse than stealing his purse. The manufacturer's name must mean value or he can not build a permanently paying business. That value is an asset as valuable as his plant and merchandise. I contend that he has a right to ask and to receive protection from those who would rob him of this value. That protection can only come through the right to maintain a uniform selling price to the buyers of his product.

I believe in the referendum, in submitting matters of public welfare to the people and abiding by their decision. When a manufacturer refers his case directly to the people and gets a favorable vote from the people in their demand for his product, I believe he should have the benefit. If he does not get a favorable decision he goes out of business, and I am opposed to putting him out of business because he does get a favorable decision. And that is exactly what price cutting means to the manufacturer who has made a standard article and created a public demand for it.

But I go further than the manufacturer and contend that uniform selling prices of standard branded goods will benefit the retailer also.

Mr. NORTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I have only 10 minutes, but I will yield.

Mr. NORTON. Has the gentleman received very many demands from his constituents, outside of retailers, for this bill?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I have had demands from manufacturers, retailers, and consumers.

Mr. NORTON. Very many of them?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I have received demands from a number of consumers, and I will take that phase up in a moment. I believe it is as fair to the consumer as to the retailer and manufacturer. If it were against the consumer's interests I would not be for the proposition.

Mr. WEBB. Does the gentleman indorse the principles enunciated in the Dick against Henry case? Do you believe that the patentee ought to go as far as that decision said he had a right to go?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I believe the patent question can be decided on another line entirely. If a manufacturer has a monopoly, this bill provides that the strong arm of the Government shall break the monopoly, for private monopoly and liberty can not live together. The argument that the gentleman refers to, and that is in his mind, is that this bill is favorable to monopoly. It is not a help to monopoly. It is a means of breaking monopoly, because price cutting, not price maintenance, leads to concentration of power, and power in the hands of a few, and monopoly.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I will.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Does the bill define a monopoly?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. The bill goes to the Sherman antitrust law for the definition of monopoly, as I understand it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. How is it to be ascertained as to how the goods shall go on the market under the monopoly clause of the bill?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Whenever a manufacturer or a combination of manufacturers has a substantial monopoly of a certain general class of merchandise, then of course that does not come within the scope of this bill, and the antitrust laws operate. But let me return to the retailer. Cutthroat competition never did and never will help the business of the average dealer.

I will admit that this may not hold good as regards mail-order houses, department stores, and so forth, because their interests seem to lie in the direction of putting the little merchant out of business and taking his trade. I am not anxious to help them do that and I am willing to let them take care of themselves, and without doubt they are perfectly able to do it. I take my stand on the side of the little corner store against the great combinations that threaten to wipe it out of existence. I stand with Littlefellow & Co. against the Soak-em-good mail-order houses. I consider the neighborhood store a necessity and I want it to have a fair chance, no more and no less, to grow greater and finer.

The large semimonopolistic retail establishments want the right to enforce cutthroat competition because they know that in such a jungle warfare the strong and cunning always triumph. Mr. Straus, of Macy & Co., when testifying before a congressional committee last year, was asked what would happen to the retailer of small financial ability if the consumers are led by cut prices to patronize large department stores and mail-order houses. He replied that the little retailer would either "wake up or go to sleep." He was right in the last phrase, for the little retailer would go to sleep permanently. He would be a victim of the knock-out drops of unfair competition. If he is not rich enough and powerful enough to compete on such an unfair basis with these gigantic combinations he must go out of business, and Mr. Straus and the others are in favor of putting him out and seeing that he never comes back.

Under fair conditions, however, the little retailer can compete with and outdistance the big mail-order houses. He can not do it on cut prices on standard goods, for the big establishments can lose money on a few articles and make it up on others in their large and varied stocks. They make it up, rest assured of that, for it costs them far more to do business than the little dealer, and the large dividends paid by the great mail-order houses show how profitable their dealings are in the aggregate.

It has been proven by sworn testimony that the big mail-order houses and department stores do business at a much greater cost than the small retailer. They have higher expenses and must make greater margins on goods sold. It follows that they can not afford to cut the cost of any article, and if they do they are compelled to make more than a fair profit on other goods sold. They use certain standard articles as "pullers-in" in order to tempt the people to buy unfamiliar and unnamed goods at unjust prices.

Prof. Neystrom, professor of economics in the University of Wisconsin, before the Judiciary Committee of the House on March 19, 1914, showed that the average cost of doing business to the small retailer is between 15 and 18 per cent; to the large mail-order houses it is from 27 to 30 per cent; and to large department stores 30 per cent and more.

These immense establishments must make a greater average profit than the small retailer, but they are able to destroy the market for the small dealer on every standard, trade-marked article on which they cut prices.

The history of the United Cigar Stores shows the effect of price cutting. In 1912, 1,252 cigar manufacturers went out of business, and in 1913, 716 cigar manufacturers went to the wall. All over the country, in every town and city invaded by these stores the retail tobacco dealer was ruined. In New York City 90 per cent of the retail dealers have been forced out of business by this combination. The small dealer must handle standard brands in order to satisfy his customers, but he can not afford to cut them below cost as do the United Cigar Stores. He can not carry the large stock of unknown brands on which to recoup his losses.

The same situation obtains in the drug business, the grocery business, and other lines. Half of the business of the smaller stores in these lines is in standard, trade-marked goods. If the market is destroyed by reckless price cutting, the little merchant must go out of business. He is between the devil and the deep sea. He can not meet the figures of the price cutter, and if he does not, he loses his customers.

Systematic price cutting was an invention of the Oil and Tobacco Trusts, which sold their products below cost in certain localities in order to crush competition. It is now being used by great mail-order houses and department stores to crush the small dealer. Public policy and the common good demand that this power be taken from them. It can only be done through the right of price maintenance, which will prevent the use of their unfair methods of competition.

Price maintenance does not mean less competition between retailers, it means less unfair competition. There is a competition in the quality of goods and in service just as much as in price. Retailers who sell the same goods from the same factories should not compete in prices. The competition should be between goods of the same class made in other factories.

That puts the competition on a fair basis, on price, quality, and service instead of solely on ability to stand losses until a competitor is driven out of business. It gives the retailer the reward of enterprise, efficiency, and honesty, instead of forcing him to descend to the level of trickery of trade pirates or go out of business.

The Stevens measure permits the retailer in case of clearance sales, retirement from business, bankruptcy, and so forth, to sell below the uniform price, provided he offers the goods to the manufacturer at the price paid for them. This permits the sale of damaged, soiled, or shopworn goods and protects both the manufacturer and the retailer at the same time.

But there is a still more important phase of this question. The maintenance of prices means benefit to the consumer. If it benefited the manufacturer and the dealer at the expense of the buyer, I should be opposed to it. The greatest good of the greatest number should be the sole purpose of legislation, and every American citizen is a consumer, while but a comparatively few are manufacturers and merchants.

But price cutting of standard articles, while ruinous to the maker and seller, never has been and never will be of permanent advantage to the buyer. In the end it adds to the cost of living and injures the entire body politic. It is a bad thing for America to have its labor or any part of its labor paid less than a fair wage. It is just as bad for America to have its business or any part of its business conducted at less than a fair profit.

When a purchaser goes into a store for goods, he desires to get the most value for his money with the expenditure of the least time and effort. The cut-price system is based on the old doctrine, "Let the buyer beware." It is a return to the old days when the purchaser was forced to make the rounds of the stores, compare the goods and the prices, and then, after finding the articles desired, haggle with the merchant until a price was agreed upon between them. That meant that the chances were all in favor of the consumer being cheated. He was dealing with a man who knew more than he did. The buyer could not possibly have the knowledge necessary to compare all kinds of unmarked merchandise and fix their value, and, as a result, swindling him was easy. Price tags meant nothing, and the entire matter of shopping was a lottery, pure and simple.

The introduction of standard, trade-marked articles, advertised and proven, changed the system of "Let the buyer beware" into one of "Protect the buyer."

When A. T. Stewart, three generations ago, revolutionized retail business by his one-price-in-plain-figures system, he took the first great step in that direction. With one stroke he abolished the system of haggling in his own store. He cut down the time required for shopping in his store and reduced the number of salesmen required, for the customers could see the prices for themselves. In this way he cheapened the cost of selling, reduced the price of goods, and made a tremendous success of his business.

But that only applied in one store. The system of standard, trade-marked goods sold in all stores at one price was a still greater step toward fairer and better merchandising. Under it the customer can go into any store at any time and be sure of securing exactly what he wants and at the same price always.

All fair-minded observers must admit that the practice of selling unnamed goods from bulk packages gives unnumbered opportunities for cheating customers. A committee investigating conditions in New York City found cheating rampant among stores selling goods to the poorer class of customers. They found that the same coffee from the same sack was sold at 25 and 37 cents a pound, and that the same tea from the same chest sold at from 35 to 70 cents a pound. This system may be carried on by dishonest dealers without fear of detection, for there is no way for the buyer to distinguish the goods from one day of purchase to the other.

Miss Laura A. Cauble, a social worker in New York, testifying before the Judiciary Committee of the House as to her work in connection with the distribution of a fund donated by a wealthy New York woman for the relief of some 8,000 families of New York poor, said:

> The committee having the distribution of this fund found that it was spending an abnormal amount of money for the amount of nourishment the food we purchased contained, and an investigation was begun to determine how we could increase the purchasing efficiency of the money at our disposal.
> I obtained samples of staple supplies at both small corner grocery stores and "chain stores" with a view to having them analyzed and obtaining bids on this basis from dealers.
>
> We found three grades of tea—one at 40 cents, one at 60 cents, and one at 90 cents. Analysis demonstrated that all this tea came from the same chest, and the bid we received on this grade of tea was 22 cents a pound. Coffee, we found, was sold in the same way, and in the "chain stores" we found an average of 10.8 per cent short weight.
>
> The larger stores, too, were cutting prices on standard goods, but their other supplies showed a general inferiority.
> On the same blocks with these larger stores the small stores were being forced to cut on standard goods.
> I investigated 526 small shops in one year, and during that time price cutting in the larger establishments either forced the sale or the failure of 116 of these smaller stores.

The consumer is protected by the system of standard, trade-marked, one-price, one-value goods. He tries the article and finds it to be satisfactory at the price asked. That gives him a standard with which to judge other articles in the same class, and he can be less easily cheated in the future.

He finds that he can go into any store and purchase the article without loss of time and be sure that he is getting exactly what he desires for his money. He finds that he can even telephone or send a child to the store and be sure that he will not be overcharged or get something different from what he desires.

If we were to go back to the old system of unidentified, unmarked goods, where every purchase is a gamble with the shopkeeper, the consumer would be hurt worst of all by such return.

Price cutting on standard articles means exactly that return in the last analysis. It means making a nation of deceitful bargainers, putting a premium on cheating practices, and placing a handicap on the honest dealer, while injuring the buyer from every angle. It forces the lowering of quality in all articles and the substitution of articles of a poorer grade for the standard articles driven from the market. The retailer must make a profit to stay in business; if he can not make it on some articles, he must increase his profits on others. The consumer must pay more for other articles when he purchases certain goods below cost. The Supreme Court of Washington stated that clearly, in a decision upholding price maintenance, when it said:

> It is a fallacy to assume that the price cutter pockets this loss. The public makes it up on other purchases.

Mr. Chairman, I want to take up the thought of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEBB], who seems to infer, judging by his questions, that this bill would give a monopoly privilege. Now, if that were true, we could not defend a bill like this; but it is not true.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there, just to make the question plain?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. I cite the Dick case, where a man had a patent on an inking machine. It was contended that he could not use other ink, not patented, on that machine. I do not think the American people will stand for that sort of thing, because there you not only give a man a monopoly that his patent gives him, but require something that amounts to a monopoly that his patent does not give him.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. That is what I had in mind. The fact that a manufacturer may have a patent monopoly is entirely aside from this proposition, because if there is a monopoly the law against restraint of trade applies and is clearly intended by this measure.

If price maintenance meant monopoly I should oppose it with every power I possess, for nothing harms the public like private monopoly, and the sooner its power to control markets and exploit the people through unbridled power is curbed the better it will be for the Nation.

But it is price cutting that means concentration of power and restraint of trade. It is more than that—it is a destroyer of trade. It gives the big combinations the power to drive small competitors out of business, and when they are destroyed the big establishments have the public at their mercy. Price cutting is the weapon of the seekers of monopoly in the retail trade of the country just as it was the weapon of the Oil and Tobacco Trusts in their efforts to crush out all competition.

Price maintenance will prevent unreasonable prices instead of making them more probable. Fair and honest competition between manufacturers of similar goods prevents any one of them from fixing and securing an unreasonable price. If he does fix an unreasonable price his competitor steps in and takes the business. Give us fair competition and we can safely allow the independent manufacturer to fix what price he will. There is all the difference in the world between controlling the market on all safety razors, for instance, and controlling the market on a single razor. If all the makers of razors should combine for the purpose of monopolizing the entire market they then should be dealt with by the strong arm of the Government, for no private monopoly can be tolerated safely in a free country.

But price maintenance has for its very purpose the prevention of restraints of trade and the practices which suppress competition and make monopoly possible. It is directly in line with the spirit of the Sherman antitrust law.

The trusts which do fix prices do not injure the public because they can fix prices, but because they have the power of monopoly to fix the price at an unjust figure. I am eternally opposed to the combinations of capital which are able to monopolize the market and fix the price they choose for their products; but I contend that the fixing of the retail price by independent manufacturers will prevent monopolies and chains of stores controlling ever wider fields of action.

The monopolist is not interested in a measure for price maintenance. The public needs his product and must come to him, and the merchant can go nowhere else. The manufacturer of unlimited capital is not interested in this measure, for he can establish a chain of stores across the country to handle his own goods and have the approval of the Government.

It is the independent manufacturer without a monopoly, without unlimited capital, but who has originality and enterprise and ability, who asks a square deal in business, and I believe he has a right not only to ask for it but to receive it.

The fight on this measure is clear-cut and distinct. The contending forces are price cutting and substitution on one side and on the other standard merchandise and the one-price system.

It is the same fight as was witnessed years ago over railroad rates. In the days of unfair and unrestricted competition in the railroad business there was a riot of dishonesty and carnival of corruption. Rebates, free passes, cut rates, and special privileges were the weapons used, and they built up a few monopolies on one hand while they crushed countless honest dealers and manufacturers on the other. Then the American Government stepped in and said that the rates should be the same to all, and fixed on a fair basis. No one to-day would wish to see a return to those piratical, jungle days of cutthroat competition, although there was bitter opposition at the time from the railroads, who were being ruined by the conditions.

I am for the one-price, square-deal-to-everybody system in merchandising. Not many decades ago a man could not sell his good will in business and agree to retire for a certain period. A famous English judge once declared that a certain man who sold his good will and agreed to stay out of business for six months was guilty of a restraint of trade and would be fined if brought into court.

To-day it is recognized that a man can sell his good will and that it is a recognized asset in his business. We will soon recognize, too, that there is such a thing as character in goods, expressed through an individual mark or brand, which means a certain value in the public mind. Justice demands that makers of these goods be given protection from unscrupulous trade pirates.

Fair play means fair trade. The fixed, uniform, and fair price to all is for the best interests of the buying public, the independent dealer, and the independent manufacturer. Congress should make every effort to end this unfair competition and assure a square deal to every party concerned in a merchandising transaction.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I can use some time on my side.

Mr. HINEBAUGH. I can use some here. I yield 30 minutes, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, during the consideration of the Post Office appropriation bill on December 31 I took occasion to discuss national finances and the growing deficit in the Treasury and to admonish the Democrats to cease from attributing the deficit to the European war. At that time I had before me the October summary of foreign commerce issued by the Department of Commerce, which gave the figures for the first 10 months of the calendar year 1914. I used unofficial figures for November and estimates for December in computing the imports and customs revenues for the year. I then pointed out that the falling off in customs revenue was in the main due to lower tariff and not to decrease of imports.

That was the statement made by the gentleman from Alabama in the closing debate on the conference report on the bill. That statement was based on the Treasury figures and the statement which he printed in the RECORD. So it was no guess. The Underwood law was intended to produce $249,000,000 a year, or from $70,000,000 to $80,000,000 less than the old tariff act which it superseded. It is also pointed out that it came within about $6,000,000 of doing so. In my former remarks I said that, estimating the imports for December at the same as they were in November, the total imports for 1914 would exceed by a few dollars the imports for the previous year. But the official figures now show that the falling off for December was more than was estimated, and that the total imports for 1914 were $3,320,479 less than for the previous year.

In 1913 there were nine months of time under the Payne law and three months under the Underwood rates, so that we did not get the full benefit of the rates of the Payne law for the whole year, but we collected in 1913 $310,551,961 in customs revenues, while in 1914, under the Underwood rates, we collected $241,384,619, a falling off of $69,167.342.

Now, I want you to note this particularly. In my former remarks I said that the actual receipts would fall but five or six million dollars below the $249,000,000 estimated by Mr. UNDERWOOD for the fiscal year 1915. They actually fell off $7,000,000, so that I was not far out of the way, because, as I have shown here, they were $241,384,619. But the whole falling off in customs receipts between the two years was more than $69,000,000, whereas the falling off in the total imports was only $3,000,000. It is plain that you could not lose $69,000,000 in customs receipts from a falling off in total imports of $3,000,000. So that it stands absolutely established by the official figures that it is the lower rate of duty under the Underwood law and not the smaller imports that is the cause of the smaller income.

I have now received and have before me the monthly summary for December, giving the official figures for the whole calendar year 1914.

I read from this summary, which shows that in December the average ad valorem rate of duty based on total imports was 11.06 per cent. During 1912, the last year in which the Payne rates were in full force, we collected on the average on total imports 18.14 per cent. During 1914, the calendar year that is just passed, we collected, according to this official statement, 13.62 per cent. Now, how can anyone contend that we could collect as much money when we collected 13 per cent as when we collected 18 per cent? The making of such a claim passes comprehension. It must be plain to any fair-minded person who wants to think that they have attributed the falling off in customs revenues to the wrong cause.

The President, in his address to Congress asking for the war tax, as he called it, referred to August, 1913, and said that the falling off in revenue was ten and one-half million dollars. He made a mistake of about a million dollars, but, as it was against his own side of the contention, I presume it was purely accidental, but it shows carelessness. Now, the total imports for August, 1913, were $137,651,553, and for August, 1914, they were $129,767,890; mark you, only a decrease of $7,883,663.

Upon that falling off in the total amount of imports—that is, the decrease of imports of $7,000,000—the President asked us to believe that we lost $11,500,000 of revenue. On that theory he must have proposed to put a duty on the goods that we did not get of about 150 per cent. Of course no Democrat would propose such duties as that. In other words, the amount of imports for August, 1914, were $7,883,660 short of August, 1913, but assuming there had been no decrease, that the imports for the two months had been the same, we would have collected 13.62 per cent on the $7,883,660, or $1,073,754. Give the war credit for the whole decrease in imports that month and you account for $1,073,754 falling off in customs receipts due to war, and the other $10,429,835 of the August shortage must be due to the lower rate. In other words, the decrease of imports (war) explains the loss of one million customs revenue in August last, and the low rate of the Underwood law explains the loss of ten millions. The war was a minor factor, and the low rate and large free list was the main factor.

During the seven months immediately preceding the war the total imports were $1,140,593,373, an increase of $121,944,698 over the corresponding months of 1913, and yet the receipts from customs fell from $180,000,698 for the former period to $156,640,150 for the latter. A decrease of $23,360,548.

This disposes of the contention that the war was either the sole or the main cause of the reduced customs revenue. I do not think that now, after the campaign excitement is over, that even the President, strong partisan though he may be, would repeat the assertion in his address, to wit:

I need not tell you to what this falling off is due. It is due in chief part, not to the reductions recently made in the customs duties, but to the great decrease in importations; and that is due to the extraordinary extent of the industrial area affected by the present war in Europe.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STEENERSON. For a question only.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman please give us the total income for the fiscal year 1913–14?

Mr. STEENERSON. The total income?

Mr. FOWLER. The total revenue.

Mr. STEENERSON. I am not talking about total income. I am talking about customs revenues, which is what the President referred to in his address. That would be another speech. I have got one, but I am not delivering that speech now.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. No; I will not yield further. These figures are quite complicated, and I desire to finish the argument. I said that it would not be fair to the Democrats to say that the war did not have some effect upon customs receipts, but what are they? How much has the reduced importations reduced the revenues? I have figured out the difference between the imports for each month, August, September, October, November, and December, 1914, according to the official figures, and I find that during those five months since the beginning of the European war the value of the total imports decreased $134,936,427. But supposing that those imports had come in and that we had collected on them the same rate that we collected on what actually came in? Then you gentlemen who supported the Underwood tariff law ought to be satisfied. If there was no falling off in imports, then the war could not be the reason, for you say the war stops imports. Now, if there had been no falling off, and we had actually collected 13.62 per cent, the duty that we actually collected on what came in, then whatever falling off there was in customs receipts was due to the lower tariff rates. That was the test the President made, the difference between the total imports for August, 1914, as compared with 1913. If we apply the same test to the five months since the war up to the beginning of this year and give the war credit for the whole decrease we find this result. The total decrease for those five months in the value of imports was $134,936,427. But if those goods had come in, the duty at 13.62 per cent would have amounted to $17,892,570. That is every cent that you can honestly claim to have been the deficit caused by the European war in the falling off of imports last year as compared with 1913. But what does $17,000,000 amount to in this deficit? Why, I have here the Treasury statement for February 15. It shows that where you started out with nearly $150,000,000 balance in the general fund, there was on February 15 a net balance of $45,433,746.06. And over on this page I find net excess of all disbursements this day over receipts, $1,231,376; and for the first 15 days of this month of February, 1915, the excess of expenditures over receipts was $11,586,843. In the corresponding month of 1914 the excess was $6,686,571. For the fiscal year 1915 to this date the excess of expenditures over receipts, $100,757,386.75. You have in six and a half months spent more than $100,000,000 in excess of the receipts of the Government. That is only for the first seven and a half months of this fiscal year. For the fiscal year 1914 you spent $45,793,482 more than the receipts. At this rate you will exhaust the forty-five million in the general fund inside of four months.

Now, assuming in fairness, as I say, that you lost $17,000,000 in customs revenue the last five months of 1914 by reason of the decrease of imports, it would not help you out very much on a deficit of $100,000,000. But, as I have shown already, take it for the whole calendar year, the decrease of imports is only $3,000,000, and if it was not for the lower rates and your larger free list you would hardly have lost anything in the customs revenue as compared with the year before.

Now we come to another cause. I do not know how true it is, but the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] the other day, in the debate on the naval bill, said that in addition to the deficit in ordinary expenditures there will be a deficit in the Post Office Department, due to the falling off of postal receipts, of at least $14,000,000 unless conditions change very much. That condition, he said, had been brought about to a large extent by reason of the war in Europe.

Here is the same scapegoat, that you have been working for lo! these many months, coming into the postal affairs. You have all read the Scripture of how they used to put the sins of the people on the poor goat and send him out into the wilderness. You have been using the European war as that kind of a goat, and this is the last attempt.

The gentleman from Alabama said:

In addition to that—the deficit in ordinary expenditures—there will be a deficit in the Post Office Department, due to a falling off of postal receipts, of at least $14,000,000, unless conditions change very much. Of course, that condition has been brought about to a large extent by reason of the war in Europe. Our foreign mail service is not paying the revenues to the Government that it has paid in the past, which is natural, and the cost of the service is practically the same. So that as this condition faces the country and the House, unless you are willing to retrench in expenditures, or unless, when the next Congress meets, you are willing to increase the taxation, you are going to face a deficit in the Treasury of something like $35,000,000.

Now, here is the majority leader by main strength bringing in an imaginary postal deficit and attributing that to the war. He was not satisfied with the former record in laying the general deficit to the European war, but he says there is a great profit in the foreign mail and the foreign mail is decreasing.

What are the facts? I have here before me the report of the Second Assistant Postmaster General, and this story about a great profit in the foreign mail is an old one, so old that its whiskers reach clear to the floor. [Laughter.] It used to be put forward in Republican administrations as an argument for a subsidy to steamship companies, because they said that we made so much money on the foreign mails that we could afford to spend a few million dollars for subsidies. I am sorry now that we did not do so, for it might have avoided the present demand to tax the people for $40,000,000 to aid a merchant marine.

Mr. MADDEN. There has been a balance against it for several years, has there not?

Mr. STEENERSON. That depends on how you figure the matter. The Postmaster General in his report says that the net cost of the Foreign Mail Service was $3,565,323.89; and then, on another page, he says the amount collected as postage prepaid by the sender and as deficit postage collected of the addressees in this country amounted to $11,872,074.98. But he says the amount of mail to Canada and Mexico is estimated at so much, and of course that did not go by foreign steamship. That leaves $8,222,000. Of course that would leave a profit of about four and a half million dollars. But remember that under this calculation there is no account taken whatever of the shore expenses.

Under the International Postal Union rule every country collects all the postage upon articles mailed within its boundary and keeps it, and if there is any short postage on incoming mail they collect that and keep it. Each country pays the transportation for the outgoing mail—not only the inland cost, but the ocean cost—and they do not charge anything for the transportation of the incoming mail. The report shows that there were 25,000,000 pounds of foreign mail. Now, if we estimate the incoming mail at 20,000,000 pounds—and that is conservative—we would have 45,000,000 pounds of mail, 20,000,000 pounds transported from the ocean inland and distributed to the addressees, and we would have collected all mail going to foreign countries, hauling that, too, without any charge for it. If you charge at the rate of 8 cents a pound, which Postmaster General Hitchcock estimated it would cost to handle second-class matter, we would have $3,600,000 to be charged to foreign mail, which, deducted from the alleged profit, leaves just about $1,000,000 actual profit. If the volume of foreign mail has decreased one-fifth, the loss would only be $200,000. But it is not correct to say that if there was a falling off it would be all loss, because the expenses would be less if it fell off.

Mr. LLOYD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. Yes.

Mr. LLOYD. Is it not a fact that the postal receipts have fallen off largely since the 1st of August, and that there is a deficit from the 1st of August up to the present time?

Mr. STEENERSON. No, sir; I think the gentleman is entirely mistaken. I telephoned to the Post Office Department yesterday, to the office of the Assistant Postmaster General, Mr. Dockery, and they said that the report for the quarter ending September had not been received, and that there were no official figures whatever to be obtained.

Mr. LLOYD. You may not be able to obtain official figures, but there can be no question of the fact that there has been a positive reduction in receipts since the 1st of August.

Mr. STEENERSON. That may be, but it is not due to falling off in the foreign mail. It is due to the depression of business which is general throughout the country, due to a Democratic administration. [Applause on the Republican side.] There is no better index to the business of the country than the volume of the first-class mail. You can find that in the administrations all the way down from Lincoln to the present time. During the time of protection there has been prosperity and a large volume of mail, and it is the best index. Whenever the shadow of free trade has come upon the country under Democratic administrations the postal receipts have fallen off. [Applause on the Republican side.] I expect they will fall off, but this story of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] that it is due to the falling off of the foreign mail is 99 per cent moonshine. I telephoned to the steamship office, the American Line——

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEENERSON. In a minute—and they said their load had greatly increased in the trans-Atlantic mail. I have a letter here from the officials to show that the decrease in the foreign mail is but a bagatelle. I will print it. But suppose it was all wiped out, it would not account for a $14,000,000 deficit or a $4,000,000 deficit or a $2,000,000 deficit or a $1,000,000 deficit in the postal receipts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Illinois to grant me more time.

Mr. HINEBAUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. STEENERSON. For a question.

Mr. LLOYD. Is it not true that during the last fiscal year the postal receipts largely increased?

Mr. STEENERSON. I believe they did increase some, but not very much.

Mr. LLOYD. Is it not true that it resulted in a surplus?

Mr. STEENERSON. Oh, that surplus is another fictitious thing. That surplus is not a genuine surplus. The volume of postal business increased because you increased the weight of the mail by lifting the amount to be carried by parcels post up to 50 pounds. Of course, if you are going to do business at a loss, you can increase the receipts, but you increase the expenditures twice as fast as you do the receipts. [Applause on Republican side.] That is not the way we do in the Republican administrations. When we have prosperity and lots of first-class mail, upon which we make a large profit, we show large postal receipts as compared with previous years.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. Is it not true——

Mr. STEENERSON. Oh, the gentleman is taking up my time, and I decline to yield. Well, I will take that back. I will yield that he may ask me a question.

Mr. LLOYD. Is it not true that the parcels post results in a profit to the Government?

Mr. STEENERSON. There may be a small profit on some of it, but on the most of it there is a loss. You know very well that is what is the matter with the Post Office Department today. The Postmaster General knows that his orders increasing the weight of mail has so overburdened the transportation companies that if he pays the present rate there will be a deficit. That is what is the matter with him.

Mr. LLOYD. Oh, I beg the gentleman's pardon——

Mr. STEENERSON. The gentleman knows very well. He was on the commission that investigated it, and he knows very well that the fear of this administration is that they can not continue to pay the transportation rates under the old weights of four years ago; that very soon there will be new weighings after the volume has been increased by large packages in the parcel post, and that as a result of that the gentleman's commission and the department have proposed to pay by space instead of by weight. That is the secret of that proposition. I voted for it because I wanted to help the Government as much as I could, even though it might be severe on the transportation companies.

Mr. LLOYD. The gentleman certainly wishes to be fair to the Post Office Department?

Mr. STEENERSON. I do.

Mr. LLOYD. And the Post Office Department unquestionably gives out the information that the parcel post has resulted in a profit to the Government.

Mr. STEENERSON. How can they give such information out when they have not got it? [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] They tell me that they have not got it. I telephoned them yesterday and they said that Gov. Dockery was absent, but they said also that they could not give any such information because the reports had not been received.

Of course, if they give Democrats their confidence and give them information that other members of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads can not obtain, I can not help it. I have to go according to the light that I have, and not according to any such information as the gentleman may have

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, it is unfair to Gov. Dockery, the Third Assistant Postmaster General, to charge him now with failing to give out information.

Mr. STEENERSON. I do not charge that, because they tell me that they do not have it.

Mr. LLOYD. Because he at this date is home on account of the death of one of his friends.

Mr. STEENERSON. Oh, I think the world of Gov. Dockery. He is a friend of mine, and I admire and I love him, but he can not give information that he does not possess.

Mr. LLOYD. He has the information that the parcel post is a success.
